Natives call for Lolita's return

BY DAMON SCOTT
Staff Reporter

A 16-foot totem pole depicting the orca Tokitae made its way from Bellingham, Washington, to Miami in May, pausing at many stops along the way, including at Big Cypress.

The totem was part of a trek of Lummi Nation tribal leaders, tribal members and their supporters – including some Seminole and Miccosukee – to bring attention to the Lummi's request that the orca (or killer whale) at the Miami Seaquarium known as Lolita, be returned to the Salish Sea where she was captured decades ago.

"It is our sacred obligation to bring our sister, Tokitae, home to the Salish Sea to be with her family," Lummi Chairman Jay Julius said in a statement. "Tokitae was stolen from her family, from her people so many years ago. She is a precious part of our family and important to the Salish Sea ecosystem. We must bring her home to be safely reunited with her family."

Seaquarium officials say Lolita has received excellent care during her years in captivity since 1970, where she performs in shows. In a statement provided to The Seminole Tribune, Eric A. Eimstad, Seaquarium general manager, said Lolita would not be released.

"Miami Seaquarium has the utmost respect for the Lummi Nation and the services that the Lummi Business Council provides to its people. However, the members of the Lummi Business Council are not marine mammal experts and are misguided when they offer a proposal that is not in the best interest of Lolita the orca," Eimstad said.

Strategy, legal challenges

Lummi officials say they have a well thought out plan for Lolita's return to the Pacific Northwest, so she can live out her remaining years safely and in comfort. "We're not just going to take her back and dump her in the ocean," Lummi Councilmember Fred Lane told The Seminole Tribune.

Lane said the Lummi's have a "retirement plan," for Lolita, who is close to 50 years old, in concert with The Orca Network and other groups. It is part of a $3.5 million project that

Alex Johns named Florida Cattlemen's Association president

Johns is first Native American to lead the organization

BY BEVERLY BIDNEY
Staff Reporter

ORLANDO — A new chapter has been added to the Seminole Tribe's storied history in the cattle industry. Tribal member Alex Johns was named president of the Florida Cattlemen's Association at its annual convention June 21 in Orlando.

Johns is the first Native American to lead the nearly 5,000-member organization.

"My family can trace its roots to 1541 when the cattle came to Florida," Johns, of the Brighton Reservation, said in his address to the convention. "Cattle and horses have always been a way of life for me. Cows always made sure we had money and food on the table. I've always been searching for a way to give back to the magical animal who gave so much to me."

During his one year term of office, Johns, who also serves as the Tribe's natural resources director, plans to promote the Florida cattle industry to create public awareness. The slogan is "Show Your Passion" and he wants every member of the FCA to embrace it.

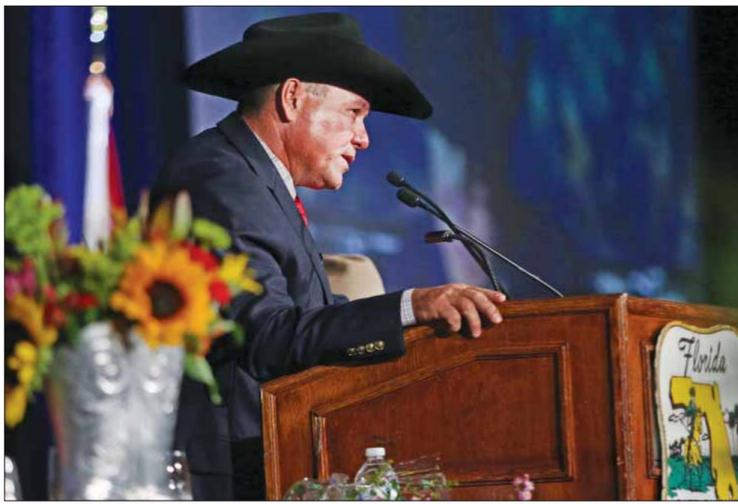

"I know we are all humble and want to keep our heads in the woods, but the new social media is where millennials get their news," he said. "We as an industry have to get there as well. I want you to post the stuff you do every day at #showyourpassion. Tag me. This is the most efficient way to promote our industry."

The announcement got the attention of the estimated 2,000 conventioners and with enthusiastic applause, they welcomed their new president.

Seminole Tribal Board members Larry Howard, Joe Frank and Gordon Wareham attended the convention's banquet.

"It is a privilege for someone of Alex's caliber to represent the Tribe as the president of the FCA," said Howard, Brighton Board Rep. "For him to have that input in the state on behalf of the Tribe, we couldn't have anyone better."

"This is an exciting time for the Tribe," added Frank, Big Cypress Rep. "This will open the way for other Tribal members to go out for other state leadership positions. It's a good example for our youth."

The Florida cattle industry began in the 1500s when Spanish explorers brought the animals across the Atlantic. Native Americans' involvement can be traced to 1740s and the Seminole leader Cowkeeper's massive herds in northern Florida. By 1775, the Seminoles worked 7,000 to 10,000 head on Paynes Prairie near Gainesville and were cattle keepers until the Seminole Wars and Civil War decimated the Tribe and its herds.

It wasn't until the 1930s, after the Tribe was living on reservations, that cattle were introduced again in the form of about 400 malnourished animals. With time, the Tribe's cattle operation grew and by the 1990s it had become an industry leader. Today the Tribe's program is one of the top in the nation.

In his role as natural resources director, Johns has overseen and guided the Tribe's cattle program. In 2013 he urged the board to purchase Salacoa Valley Farms in Fairmount, Georgia, a successful seed stock operation. Johns knew that superior genetics would lead to a better beef product and he believes the Salacoa purchase has improved the quality of Seminole Beef produced by the Tribal herd.

For more than a dozen years, Johns has served in various leadership positions in the FCA. The nonprofit organization's membership, comprised of cattle producers and affiliates statewide, represents 900,000 to a million cows in the state and accounts for about $700 million in calf sales annually.

The process of taking the FCA helm began for Johns with committee, county and district leadership positions. The path to the presidency was a six year process in which he served as secretary, treasurer, second vice president, first vice president and president elect. The process ensures the work that is started, which often takes years to be completed, is understood by everyone in leadership roles.

"Alex may be a once in a lifetime president," said outgoing president Ken Griner. "He has the history and heritage of the Seminole Tribe, which is the history of the entire cattle industry. Alex is so engaged in our industry there is no conversation he isn't fully engaged in. He brings a set of skills that's hard to duplicate. There are just

Vickey Huff retires as Elder Services director

BY BEVERLY BIDNEY
Staff Reporter

BIG CYPRESS —

After spending the better part of 30 years making sure Seminole seniors had all their needs met, Director of Elder Services Vickey Huff has retired. Now she intends to pay a little more attention to herself, her family and her interests. Her journey began with a retirement party June 22 at the Big Cypress Senior Center.

"She's done a fantastic job and we kind of hate to see her leave," said President Mitchell Cypress. "But at the same time, you have to take care of your family."

One of Huff's favorite aspects of the job as director was doing the paperwork to assure all the seniors got their trips approved, had plenty of activities to do and fun parties to enjoy.

"I knew I was doing my job well by doing the services for them," said Huff, whose last day on the job was June 1. "It hasn't hit yet, I'm just trying to enjoy life. The best part is not having to wake up so early."

Huff spent more than 35 years working for the Tribe in various roles but when she began working as a secretary with the seniors, she knew she had found her place. Over the years she moved up and six years ago applied for and was promoted to director.

Nadine Bowers, Big Cypress Elder

Hollywood site manager Joe Kippenberger also enjoyed working with Huff.

"She was very professional,"

Immokalee Elder Services site manager. "She always stuck up for her team and backed us up."

Huff believes it takes a certain set of skills to do the job well.

Rhonda Goodman, who has worked with the seniors in various capacities for 15 years, has replaced Huff as the tribal-wide elder services director. Goodman filled in for Huff for a few months when she was out on medical leave.

"It takes a lot of patience, dedication and compassion," Goodman said about the position. "Sometimes it's just sitting and listening. Being honest and communicating with the elders and your staff is also important."

Huff's future plans include staying home with her husband of 32 years, John Huff, traveling together, relaxing and just enjoying life. She also looks forward to spending plenty of time with her 13 grandchildren.

"I like having her home full-time," John Huff said. "I just like hanging out with her."

Huff's extended family attended the retirement party, which featured an interactive performance by an Elvis impersonator and plenty of gifts and well wishes from seniors and staff. The overwhelming sentiment was repeated by many in attendance; she will be missed.

Vickey Huff, seated, is surrounded by her family Jimi Lu Jamison, John Huff Jr., Jarrett Beecham, John Huff, Ty Huff and Frank Huff at her retirement party at the Big Cypress Senior Center.

Vickey Huff displays the gift of a painting of herself and her husband John Huff at her retirement party June 22. Newly named Elder Services director Rhonda Goodman assists Huff with the gifts.

Services site manager, worked with Huff for six years.

"She was a good boss," Bowers said. "We are going to miss her."

Kippenberger said. "It was a real learning experience."

"She was lenient and straightforward at the same time," added Demi Garza,

"Someone with a heart, who really cares for and respects the elders, should work with them," Huff said.

The summer of Paulette Jordan

• Magic Valley Editorial Board

Barring something unexpected, Idaho's next governor will be one of two people: Republican Brad Little, the state's lieutenant governor, or Democrat Paulette Jordan, a former state representative from Plummer.

Little garnered 37.3 percent of the statewide vote in the May 15 primary election, beating out U.S. Representative Raul Labrador's 32.6 percent and businessman Tommy Ahlquist's 26.2 percent. It was a fairly close race, with Labrador winning several counties in north Idaho and Ahlquist faring well in east Idaho. Little dominated the middle portion of the state though, including Ada County and every Magic Valley county except Cassia (Ahlquist won there by one percentage point.)

On the Democratic side, it was the most contested governor's primary in a while, but still a downright landslide. A.J. Balukoff won 16 counties May 15, including Gooding County, but earned just 40.1 percent of the statewide vote. Balukoff ran for governor in 2014 too, losing to C.L. "Butch" Otter in the general election.

Jordan took 58.5 percent of votes, beating Balukoff by almost 20 points. She and Balukoff tied in both Minidoka and Cassia counties — strange, but less so when considering fewer than 400 Democratic ballots were cast in those two counties combined.

The most surprising county result was in Ada County, where Balukoff served as a school board member for more than 20 years. Jordan won the county, which includes Boise, by a whopping 28 points. In 2014's primary election, a little more than 10,000 Democratic ballots were cast in Ada County. That number almost tripled May 15.

The much-discussed "blue wave" has probably not hit Idaho, despite the concerns of Republicans and the optimism of Democrats. But the Paulette Jordan wave is here, at least for the summer.

For the next few months, get prepared to see a lot more of Jordan. She didn't earn many endorsements from her fellow legislators — those, strangely, went to Balukoff — but she received several national endorsements, including from Cher and Planned Parenthood. Several national outlets, including Buzzfeed, The Atlantic and Huffington Post have honed in on Jordan as a Democratic hope in a firmly red land.

And perhaps rightfully so. There is a lot in Jordan's biography to like, especially for a progressive voter: She is seeking to be Idaho's first woman governor, and she would be the first Native American governor anywhere in the U.S.

If you thought Jordan was receiving a lot of national media attention before the primary election, strap in. She's about to really go national.

It will be interesting to see how heavily the Democratic National Committee pushes Jordan over the next few months. Despite her convincing win May 15, she will still head into the November general election as an underdog. She will likely pull some of the anti-establishment Republicans who voted for Labrador and Ahlquist, but Little still has two decades of public service under his belt, including the past 10 years as Idaho's second-in-command.

Much will be written in the coming months about Jordan's background and her trailblazing efforts in pursuit to become Idaho's next governor. But voters will need to dig a little deeper. And the Jordan campaign, after being in disarray during the final weeks of the primary, must lay out for voters exactly what a Paulette Jordan-led Idaho looks like. If they can do that, the summer of Paulette Jordan might just carry over into November.

Lakota immersion classes use past to brighten future

• Argus Leader Editorial Board

Amid the negativity that often dominates headlines concerning Native American issues in South Dakota, it's good to take the time to accentuate the positive.

Recent news that Rapid City's General Beadle Elementary School is expanding its year-old part-time Lakota immersion class to a full-time classroom this fall deserves celebrating.

The program's growth is good news on multiple fronts. It benefits from and reinforces efforts by groups like the Lakota Language Consortium to preserve and revitalize a language too close to the edge of extinction.

It is also a heartening step toward a brighter future for South Dakota youth. Research supports indigenous-language immersion instruction as an effective path to better outcomes for Native students, which led Todd County to pursue a different education model based on a charter school in New Mexico.

Red Cloud Indian School on the Pine Ridge Reservation has been on a decade-long drive to develop a comprehensive K-12 curriculum with its Lakota Language Project. The program's second phase more deliberately engages family and community to extend and deepen the connections between lessons and life. Effective immersion programs don't end at the schoolhouse door.

As a program outside reservation boundaries, the elementary immersion program in Rapid City charts new territory. It's exciting to ponder what lessons Sioux Falls can glean by studying the program as it unfolds on the other side of the state.

Drawing direct comparisons between the public school systems of South Dakota's two largest cities is not a straightforward affair. Sioux Falls has a larger student body but a lower percentage (4 percent) of Native American students than does Rapid City (10 percent).

But, like the rest of the state, both districts struggle with markedly lower Native American attendance and graduation rates. In Sioux Falls schools last year, the four-year cohort graduation rate of all students was just under 84 percent. In contrast, the graduation rate for Native American students was under 45 percent.

Both districts also strive to integrate tribal culture and history into the educational experience. Sioux Falls' Native American Connections program aims to strengthen students' feelings of empowerment with their schools. NAC selective classes are offered at Sioux Falls middle and high schools, and Lakota/Dakota I and II fulfill world language requirements for high school graduation.

At Lincoln High, the NAC class has borne impressive fruit in the form of a monthly newsletter, Mitakuye Oyasin ("We are all related"). Composed entirely by members of the class, the publication features Native history, poetry, editorials and artwork.

Interweaving culture into all aspects of the educational experience has a measurable impact for our Native American students. As language and culture are inextricably entwined, the deliberate Lakota language renaissance is a boon to the state and all its citizens.

We salute forward-looking programs like Rapid City's expanding Lakota immersion program as a means of helping Native students explore links to their legacy, leaning on a proud past to build hope for a brighter future.

Ottawa must learn from failures on Indigenous programs

• The (Toronto) Star Editorial Board

More Indigenous children are taken from their homes by children's aid societies today than were displaced at the height of the residential school system.

The inquiry into murdered and missing Indigenous women is bogged down in delay and recriminations.

And the federal government spent $110,000 to avoid paying a $6,000 bill for a 16-year-old Indigenous girl's braces before finally deciding to update its dental care policies.

No matter how many politicians talk about rebuilding the relationship with Indigenous peoples and fixing the failed policies of the past, things just don't seem to get any better on the ground.

In that context, it's hardly a surprise that Canada's auditor general, Michael Ferguson, found yet more examples of federal failure. This time with Indigenous education and employment programs.

Both are vital to achieving a better future. And that makes Ferguson's recent report awfully depressing reading.

On education, he found a significant gap in high school graduation rates between Indigenous students living on reserves and other Canadian students.

That's a problem that the auditor general's office has reported on before. Not once or twice, but three times — in 2000, 2004 and 2011. And yet this new report shows that the gap has grown over the past 15 years.

Worse still, the government doesn't seem to even know that.

The government's data suggests that between 2011 and 2016 one in two on-reserve First Nations students graduated high school. In fact, the figure is just one in four, according to Ferguson.

That means the situation has gotten worse, not better, as the government's poorly collected data says.

The government only measured the graduation rates of students enrolled in their final year. That means they left out all the students who dropped out between grades nine and 11, obscuring the true picture.

Beyond that, they didn't bother to collect data on what portion of these students were graduating with a diploma that would actually be recognized by a post-secondary institution, enabling them to continue on to the higher education that's increasingly needed to succeed.

How can Indigenous Services Minister Jane Philpott possibly expect to fix a problem when her ministry doesn't even know the extent of the problem?

Education programs, sadly, aren't the only failure related to incomplete and inaccurate data.

On employment, Ferguson found that

Canada did not collect the data it needed to assess whether programs aimed at helping Indigenous people find work were actually increasing the number of people finding sustainable jobs.

And this isn't some new portfolio the department is just getting a handle on; it's something they've been doing for 30 years.

Furthermore, the department's strategy for handing out funding is based on decades-old data. And it doesn't reallocate funding to groups proven to be more successful in helping clients find jobs.

So it's the same basic problems that Ferguson uncovered on the education file: the government isn't collecting the right data in some areas, and in others it's not using the data it has to improve outcomes.

Ferguson's spring report also again exposed the complete disaster of the Phoenix pay system. "A pertinent fact about these two very different incomprehensible failures — Phoenix and Indigenous programs — is that both have been passed on from government to government," Ferguson wrote.

He's right. It's as though governments have stopped believing they can make a difference in the lives of Indigenous peoples and are simply going through the motions.

That can't continue. As Ferguson points out, failure can be "a way to learn and improve."

We've had far too much of failure just being failure. It's long past time the government learned something from it.

Native population underrepresented in Census of Agriculture

• Zach Ducheneaux

In spite of notable efforts on the part of the USDA's National Agricultural Statistics Service (NASS) and others, American Indians continue to be one of the most underrepresented groups in the Census of Agriculture. The number of American Indian producers participating in the Census has increased tremendously since the questionnaire became the responsibility of the USDA in 1997, and especially since 2007 when every American Indian farm and ranch began reporting individually. But we still have a lot of work to do to get everyone represented in the data.

Indian Country is faced with many challenges created by policy — some of which was created without our input. When federal, state, and local farm policy and programs are contemplated, NASS data are what policymakers reference to inform their decisions. Programs developed based on crops grown, conservation practices used, and even agri-finance opportunities can all be adversely affected if we don't tell our story through participation in the Ag Census. If we, as a community, do not fill out the Census of Agriculture, the data will not reflect our numbers or our needs and that could have a negative economic impact on our communities.

A stark example of this adverse impact lies in the 2012 Census data which showed that the 56,092 farms and ranches operated by 71,947 Native Americans sold a total of $3.24 billion in ag products raised on 57.3 million acres. The average size of a farm or ranch operated by Native Americans (1,021 acres) was over 200 percent larger than the national farm average (434 acres) while receiving only 67 percent ($6,698) of the amount of farm program payments received by others ($9,925). When you contemplate the per acre disparity, you can clearly see the reason we need to be more active.

Another example of the importance of the Ag Census is demonstrated by what it doesn't count. As a result of the failure to recognize subsistence production, tens of thousands of our Alaskan Native relatives go totally uncounted. As a result, there is virtually no mention of subsistence agriculture in federal farm policy.

The Census of Agriculture aims to be a complete count of all U.S. farms, ranches, and their operators, and remains the only source of uniform, comprehensive, and impartial agriculture data available at the state, county, and Tribal level. Embrace the opportunity to be heard. Take advantage of one of the important ways to help our communities. Your response will provide data that will absolutely be used to make decisions on our behalf, like funding for loans, conservation efforts, disaster relief (e.g. drought), and education.

The future is ours to shape. It is not too late to complete your 2017 Census of Agriculture. The paper questionnaire is due by June 15. However, the Ag Census can be completed online at agcensus.usda.gov through July. For questions about or assistance with your form, call (888) 424-7828.

It can be hard to look in the mirror

• Argus Leader Editorial Board

Since reports and images started coming in of children being separated from their illegal immigrant parents at the southern border, pundits across TV have been decrying the situation, repeating the mantra that "This is not America."

We hate to break it to you, but this may be one of the most American actions a presidential administration has taken in the last 70 years.

We have been destroying families and mistreating minorities since long before we were even a nation. It's in our DNA to break up families, especially if we can turn a profit at such a heinous action.

African families were divided by the highest bidders at the auction block in the 17th through the 19th centuries — that's assuming, of course, that the Africans bound into slavery managed to survive the trip.

For nearly 250 years we ripped families apart to make farms profitable. And it took another 100 years after the slaves were sent "free" before succeeding generations finally received the civil rights their ancestors were denied.

African men and women weren't the only people subject to such treatment — Native Americans fared no better. While not bound into slavery, Natives were, instead, subject to genocide so we could turn a profit from their land.

Those surviving found themselves shunted to reservations, the most inhospitable land we could find because if we can't make a profit, then it's good enough for the "savage" Native American.

Compounding the problem, we forced warring tribes to share the reservation land, creating even more death and destruction. And, again, we split families without regard, even going so far as to take away children so they could be raised "right," and right meant

"white."

Asian Americans fared a little better than African and Native Americans. Oh, sure, like all first-generation immigrants (such as the Italians, Irish and Jews), Asian Americans were not allowed to take certain work and forced to live in ghettos, but they weren't systematically rounded up. That is, until 1942.

After the attack on Pearl Harbor by the Japanese, the country found itself fearing all things Asian. And while Chinese and Filipino Americans were viewed with mistrust (by virtue of being Asian), they didn't suffer like Japanese Americans. Citizens of Japanese ancestry were rounded up and placed in internment camps for the duration of World War II. Upward of 120,000 people — about 60 percent of which were second- or third-generation American citizens — had their belongings stripped from them and were forced to live as virtual prisoners of war of their own country for no other reason than they looked like people who attacked us. And about 2,000 died in the camps, never again to know the freedom they enjoyed before being penalized for something they didn't do.

The current splitting of families at the Southern border is consistent with our nation's history. This administration seeks to profit from this action — not monetarily but in votes. Donald Trump ascended to the presidency by vilifying Hispanics, so showing adult Hispanics led away in handcuffs, with the lamentation of their children photographed for the world to see, hits all the right notes with Trump's base.

Trump's comments that this can end if Democrats come to the bargaining table are nothing but hot air. He and Attorney General Jeff Sessions want this purge to continue as long as possible because that's what their voters want — the punishment and removal of nonwhites from this country.

The TV pundits are wrong — this may not be the America we want America to be, but it most definitely is the America we've always been.

4-H wraps up successful year at annual banquet

BY BEVERLY BIDNEY
Staff Reporter

BRIGHTON — The 134-member Seminole Indian 4-H club celebrated another year of accomplishments at its annual awards banquet June 4 at the Fred Smith Rodeo Arena in Brighton. Youth participants, adult volunteers and cattle owners were recognized for their work and commitment to the program.

“What we take away from this is teaching kids the responsibility of taking care of animals,” said Brighton Board Rep. Larry Howard. “It teaches them something powerful. This is part of the history of our Tribe and we are proud of what you’ve accomplished. It is something you will carry with you for the rest of your life.”

This year saw an increased number of activities, including the chicken, sewing, photography and cooking clubs. It also marked the first time the Seminole 4-H attended the annual 4-H Day at the capitol February 22 in Tallahassee, where 15 kids learned about the workings of state government, took meetings with legislators and toured the capitol.

“We are expanding the horizons of 4-H,” said Lonnie Gore, 4-H special projects coordinator.

Participating in 4-H requires a serious commitment of time, resources and energy by the kids and their parents. The kids learn to balance school, homework, sports and other youthful activities while raising steer, heifers, swine and/or small animals.

The work begins in July, when the steer are mere 500 pound calves, or in the fall when the young pigs are only 75 to 85 pounds. Until the show and sale in March, the 4-H’ers take responsibility for the care of the animals which includes early morning feedings, daily exercise and math. The 4-H program gives its participants real-life business experience and a mandatory log must be kept of every dollar spent while raising the animals. When the animals are sold the day after the show, the kids pocket the profit.

Children may join the 4-H Cloverbud program at age 5 and raise small animals. By age 8 they are ready for a hog and at 10 should have enough experience to handle a steer.

4-H is usually a family activity; it’s common for parents to assist the kids with their duties. Some families take it further by getting numerous kids involved. The Baker family of Brighton is an example of a fully engaged 4-H family; eight kids participated this year.

“My dad [Preston Baker] inspires us,” said Ives Baker, 18. “I’ve been in 4-H for 18 years. I’m leaving now, but I’ll stay in agriculture and help my brother Ramone with his herd.”

Volunteers are the backbone of 4-H and each was honored and thanked by Florida Cooperative Extension agent Aaron Stam, who heads up the program. Graduating seniors were also recognized. Ives Baker, Troy Cantu, Dayra Koenes, Camryn Thomas, Cyrus Smedley and Samantha Veliz all left the program with their high school graduation.

The Herdsman Award is a surprise to its recipients, who have been secretly judged throughout the year for their leadership qualities. This year the awards were presented to Ramone Baker for swine and to Troy Cantu for steer.

Cattle owners were recognized with their own awards for providing the winning steer and heifers. The awards were presented to Mary Jene Koenes for the Grand Champion Steer raised by Dayra Koenes; Norman Johns ND Ranch for the Reserve Grand Champion Steer raised by Jacee Jumper; Cory Wilcox for the Grand Champion Heifer raised by Jalee Wilcox; and Paul Bowers Sr. for the Reserve Grand Champion Heifer raised by Brianna Bowers.

Another new program will be kicked off in August when a few yearling wild mustangs will be trained by 4-H’ers in 100 days.

While looking back on the year, Stam was struck by how impressed the show’s judges were with the Seminole program. They each pointed out that the youth knew more details about their animals than kids outside of the Tribe did.

“This was a great year,” Stam said. “We had smaller numbers but the kids operated on a higher level than we’ve seen in a while. It’s a testament to the leaders and the kids. I’m real pleased with how the kids, parents and leaders worked together; that’s how it should be.”

Tampa Hard Rock in midst of massive expansion

Officials look to mid-2019 completion

BY DAMON SCOTT
Staff Reporter

There's another Florida Hard Rock operation that has been making some big news lately.

While the huge guitar-shaped hotel at the Seminole Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Hollywood keeps taking shape and changing the skyline — another significant Hard Rock expansion in Tampa has been underway.

The Seminole Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Tampa is undergoing an impressive $700 million expansion of its facilities at 5223 Orient Road, about 10 minutes east of downtown.

The work began in 2017, but has begun to ramp up significantly this year, according to officials, in order to make its mid-2019 goal for completion.

The Tampa Hard Rock already boasts the largest casino in Florida, and is one of the largest in the U.S. So what exactly is being done to make things bigger and better? How about:

- 5,000 slot machines
- 200 gaming tables
- Approximately 200,000 square feet of entertainment and gaming space

The job numbers and economic development impact alone are impressive.

- 1,000 part-and-full time jobs.
- 2,000 construction jobs on-site.
- 1,022 indirect, permanent jobs.
- 2,268 indirect construction jobs.
- 6,000 additional jobs in all.
- $2.4 billion in economic investment between Tampa and Hollywood.

The Tampa operation is already one of the largest employers in Tampa Bay with more than 3,500 employees, or “team members.”

“Major expansion of the Seminole Hard Rock Tampa is further evidence of the Seminole Tribe’s commitment to the people of Florida that it will continue to increase the economic impact of its Seminole Gaming facilities,” Jim Allen, CEO of Seminole Gaming said in a statement.

Amenities galore

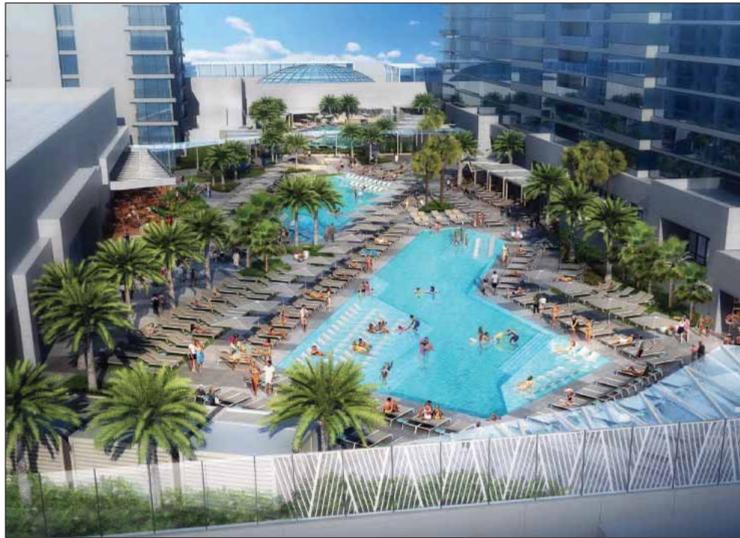

The centerpiece of the expansion is a new 15-story hotel tower, with an additional 564 hotel rooms and suites. When all is said and done, there will be 800 guestrooms and 88 suites. The top floor of the hotel tower will feature a private gaming parlor for VIP guests, including private elevators to suites.

Other amenities will include three “ultra-lavish” new outdoor swimming pools adjacent to the second level of the hotel tower that will feature a 120-seat Pool Grille restaurant and bar.

Officials said the expanded pool and deck area, designed by landscape architecture firm EDSA, will measure the size of a football field and will host a variety of activities.

A new 25,000-square-foot Rock Spa & Salon will also open on the second level of the hotel tower and will offer pool-side services. The new spa will replace the existing spa and salon.

includes the rehabilitation and release of the orca to a “sea pen” located in a protective ocean cove, where she would have access to plentiful food and the ability to interact with other orcas, including her remaining family members.

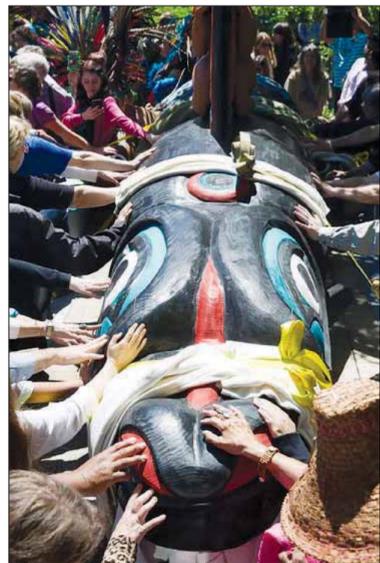

But securing Lolita’s release appears to be anything but certain. Earlier this year, the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Miami rejected claims by the People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) and other stakeholders who argued keeping Lolita in captivity violated the federal Endangered Species Act.

“The evidence, construed in the light most favorable to PETA, does not support the conclusion that the conditions of her captivity pose a threat of serious harm to Lolita,” the court said in the ruling.

However, Jared Goodman, the deputy general counsel for animal law at PETA, told the Seminole Tribune that there are still two legal actions pending. One is a request for a rehearing of the ruling from the 11th Circuit in Miami.

based on what Goodman said was the court’s failure to “analyze whether the conditions we alleged to be the case were supported.”

The other is a lawsuit against the U.S. Department of Agriculture, attempting to invalidate Seaquarium’s license to house Lolita. Goodman said the license should be revoked under the federal Animal Welfare Act. He said Seaquarium is in violation of the act because Lolita’s tank is too small and March.

Show must go on?

The public’s enthusiasm for live orca exhibitions — made most famous at SeaWorld locations in the United States — has waned in recent years. Pressure to free orcas in captivity was ramped up significantly in the wake of the 2013 documentary Blackfish, which told native tongue through song and drumming.

Lane said the group would be back in South Florida in September, and hope to be part of the Art Basel event in Miami Beach this coming December. He said the Leonardo DiCaprio Foundation was helping the group secure a spot for the totem to be displayed at the event.

no holes in his knowledge.”

According to its website, the FCA is “devoted entirely and exclusively to promoting and protecting the ability of cattlemen members to produce and market their products.” To meet that goal, the organization’s leaders represent the membership to lawmakers in Tallahassee and Washington, D.C., FCA is a grassroots and inclusive organization.

“It doesn’t matter if you have 10 cows or 10,000, you have the same voice,” Griner said.

“On a federal level, most folks can’t go to D.C. to lobby for the farm bill or any other legislative issue that would affect the small a lot of ability,” added Billy Kempler, 72, of Brevard County.

Johns plans to continue to work on issues the FCA has been addressing already, one of which is animal disease traceability. Since the FCA members produce food, the leadership believes they have a responsibility for it. If a problem arises, traceability will keep the problem local and make it easier to fix, rather than having to shut down the entire industry.

Public grazing is another important issue for the FCA, whose members help the state manage the land and make it productive through land leases. Many ranchers lease land since it can be difficult to own the vast amount necessary to raise cattle.

“Leasing is a win-win situation,” Griner said. “We provide a service to the state to reduce fire risk. If you aren’t keeping the land producer,” said President Elect Matt Pearce. “The association represents them. We lobby for less regulation and for conservation.”

Tribal members, staff and members of the Brighton community pose with Alex Johns, the newly named president of the FCA.

Griner believes one of the biggest challenges facing Johns as president will be time management. Since Florida is such a large state, making all the FCA meetings and going to Tallahassee and D.C. to address legislative issues is time consuming.

Prior to the banquet, at which he would take over the responsibilities of president, Johns socialized with FCA members at the President’s Reception. Although he claimed to be a bit nervous about the evening, he confidently greeted other cattlemen and cattlemen in the crowded room.

“It’s been a long time coming and it’s finally here,” Johns said. “I’m looking forward to it. I’ve got a good team, young leaders who are coming up [in the organization] and there are a lot of people I can call on.”

Bobby Yates, natural resources cattle foreman, has worked for Johns for years.

“I’m glad to see he got this, it means a lot to him and to the staff,” Yates said. “He’s one hell of a good boss; he’s a man’s man.”

Outside of the reception, a few longtime FCA members sat comfortably together. All were impressed with Johns and were looking forward to having him lead the organization.

“I don’t remember when I wasn’t a member [of FCA],” said Gillie Russell, 76, of Highlands County. “[Johns] is very well thought of.”

“He’s an exceptional young man and has burned or mowed or chopped, you’re ripe for a fire. Active management, whether it’s state or private enterprise, reduces management costs, keeps the state more green and helps the cattle industry.”

The banquet featured awards, acknowledgements and guest speaker Red Steagall, who entertained the crowd with a litany of stories and original songs.

“Every now and then you’ll need a lawyer and every now and then you’ll need a doctor,” he said. “But three times a day, every day of your life, you’ll need a rancher and a farmer.”

Pearce believes it’s fitting that a member of the Tribe, as one of the first in the state to have cattle, will lead the FCA.

“Alex is very detail oriented, thinks things through, sees the bigger picture and has always surrounded himself with people who can get things done,” Pearce said. “We are excited for Alex to be our leader; he brings a lot to the table.”

Griner said the best part of the job when he served as president was interacting with members, seeing parts of the state he normally wouldn’t have had time for, being exposed to different ways of doing things and different opinions. He has no doubt that Johns will rise to the task.

“He’s an extremely talented, knowledgeable person, he’s got everything,” Griner said. “He’s young, intelligent and articulate; he’s got it all. We look forward to having Alex as our president, he’s a special guy.”

Native women set out to diversify political representation

BY LI COHEN & DAMON SCOTT
Copy Editor & Staff Reporter

Women have dominated political headlines since the beginning of 2018 as this year has seen a record number of females vying for political seats. From local governments to federal positions, thousands of women are setting out to make "her" story – AKA female history – as the sheer number of female 2018 candidates has broken 1992's record. Regarding just U.S. Congressional positions, the new "Year of the Woman" has seen at least 168 more candidates than in 1992. And as those women continue fighting their ways to the general election, one group of women is setting out to transform 2018 from "Year of the Woman" to "Year of the Native Woman."

Forty-eight Native American women representing 17 states are running for state and congressional offices. Three of those women are running for U.S. Congress: Sharice Davids, D-Kans.; Debra Haaland, D-NM; and Amanda Douglas, D-Okla. The three candidates represent the Ho-Chunk, Laguna Pueblo and Cherokee tribes, respectively.

While their success wouldn't be the first time Native Americans have held congressional seats – 21 men have been in the U.S. House and Senate since 1789 – it would certainly be a dramatic shift in representation. If any of these three women are elected in the Nov. 6 midterm election, it will be the first time in history Native American women will hold congressional seats.

Sharice Davids Democratic candidate for Kansas' U.S. House District Three Sharice Davids is a member of the Ho-Chunk Nation of Wisconsin and spent the majority of her life in Kansas. There, she was raised by her mom, who also served in the U.S. Army for 20 years. Davids' political career started after she graduated with her law degree from Cornell University. Seeking to focus on equity and fighting for underserved communities, she completed a year as a White House Fellow as the administration transitioned from Barack Obama to Donald Trump.

Debra Haaland Democratic candidate for New Mexico's U.S. House District One

Debra Haaland is a member of the Laguna Pueblo tribe and was the lieutenant governor nominee of New Mexico in 2014 after serving for one year as the Native American caucus chair for the Democratic Party. She was the first Native American woman in the U.S. to chair a state party. Haaland was also the first chairwoman elected to the Laguna Development Corp. board of directors, overseeing the business operations of the second largest tribal gaming enterprise in New Mexico. She has worked on many "get out the vote" efforts and volunteered full time for President Barack Obama's 2008 campaign. Haaland is a single mother who was raised in a military family. She earned her law degree at the University of New Mexico School of Law in Albuquerque.

Amanda Douglas Democratic candidate for Oklahoma's U.S. House District One

Amanda Douglas is a member of the Cherokee tribe and has spent her entire life in Oklahoma, where she now resides with her husband and daughter. Originally a business analyst and consultant, she broke her way into politics after her daughter was born in 2016 as a way to help prepare a better future, specifically regarding education, for her child.

The Tribune spoke with these congressional candidates to find out a little bit more about their campaigns.

Q: Why do you think that Native American women running for congressional seats is so important?

A: Davids: "We should have elected officials that are more representative and reflective of what the country not only looks like in terms of the demographics, but also the experiences of a broader range of people in this country. When I think about that, I think about being a Native woman but I also think about my educational background, going from community college to my bachelors to Cornell for law school and having to work the entire time I was in college. Being raised by a single parent and even growing up in a military family, I think those kinds of experiences are things we don't see represented enough or see reflected in Congress."

Haaland: "We've never had a Native American woman in Congress before. When you think about me, or any woman looking at Congress, and not seeing them represented in those seats, it's evident that diversity is important and we need differing perspectives. Not all the answers come from a white male perspective. We need the perspectives of people who know what it's like to struggle, who struggle to find a job, who struggle to buy groceries and have those perspectives to help to solve issues."

Douglas: "I would like to be one of the first in the class of Native American females to serve [in Congress]. I'm a huge supporter of Debra Haaland of New Mexico and Sharice Davids from Kansas. It has a lot to do with not just overcoming the hurdles that minorities have to face, but also the Me Too movement has gotten a lot of women ready to speak out and ready to fight for what they think is right. I think those are two of the catalysts that have led to Native American women running for office. I think it's fantastic and I hope that we can serve together as a caucus and as a team to work toward making a difference for Native citizens."

Q: What issues are you prioritizing now and if you are elected to Congress?

A: Davids: "In terms of what's important in this district, there's a lot of focus on public education which I can of course identify with since I feel like a lot of opportunities I've had in my life stem from my access to quality public schools and being able to go to state schools and the community college here in the third district. Access to health care is a big issue across the country and that's not just because people need to be covered by insurance, but also because there are a lot of people who, even when they have insurance, don't have access to quality or affordable health care. Immigration I feel like is one of the bigger pieces of what I end up talking to a lot of people about and what personally is just very important to me. And there's so many [conversations about] climate change and us figuring out ways to be better stewards of the land and trying to make sure that we're leaving a place for our children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren that's going to have clean air and water to drink."

Haaland: "We talked a great deal in our primary campaign about the environment, climate change and renewable energy. I want to move us toward 100 percent renewable energy. It affects a lot of our Native communities. Melting ice is affecting Native communities in Alaska, for example. I care a great deal about our environment and how we produce energy in our country."

Another issue is health insurance. Working families struggle to be insured and make ends meet, when minimum wage is $7.25 hour. They struggle to find enough jobs to keep the roof over their children's heads. All of those things are important.

We need to find more equity in what people are doing. Education is tied to that. My daughter just graduated from college, and she already has a five figure student loan she has to figure out how to pay. And there's an attack on public education. We need to strengthen it – to allow every single student to have a quality public education. I'm against taxpayer money being used for a voucher system. And I know there's an issue with Impact Aid [Program] funding, which affects a lot of [American] Indian students.

Douglas: "My biggest issue is education. Right now in Oklahoma any politician that you talk to is going to say that education is their No. 1 priority because it's so important in our state right now. I like to explain to people that with a daughter that's about to be school-age and as someone who can't personally afford private school, I have a vested interest in turning education in this state around and I have a deadline because I only have so much time before I'm actually enrolling her in the school's that I want to improve. ... Sometimes people think that it's really only a state-level issue, but the budget proposal earlier this year from President Trump cut $3.5 billion from Title I funds that are specifically meant for low income and special needs students. Betsy DeVos continues to push for voucher programs that funnel even more money from public education. ... I would like to fight to stop the cuts toward education and increase federal funding for Title I programs and I want to put a stop to those voucher programs. I would also like to push for the replacement of Betsy DeVos as the Secretary of Education. I think a lot of people did not want her confirmed into that role and I don't believe she's qualified to be doing what she's doing."

Q: How do you plan to work with the Republican-led Congress to achieve your goals?

A: Davids: "What we're seeing now is just the top leadership of the party pushing against some of that and from what I've seen there are a lot of people who are Republican that are willing to come to the table and I think that as Democrats we need to be willing to come to the table as well. One of the nice things about hopefully having a massive influx of new congressional members is that there will be new action taken in a place where the status quo or the homogenous group of people ... when there's a shift in that I'm hoping there will be a shift in people who are willing to work together a little bit more."

Haaland: "I believe wholeheartedly that we have a big opportunity to flip the House. I think that's a reality. So I am going to work to that end, first of all. I am more than happy to work with any Republicans who will help Americans get health care and move the country toward 100 percent renewable energy."

Douglas: "My husband is a Republican and he has been since I met him and he's not changed his affiliation even to vote for me in the primary. I joke that we're a bipartisan household, but I'm also serious in that I do have to on a daily basis be able to listen and hear the opinions of someone who's politically different from me and process that in a way that is civil and leans toward progress. I think what we see now is people on the extreme left at people on the extreme right and really most people fall somewhere in the middle of that range. [We just need] people who know how to work with other people and aren't just out to push the national party principles. I want to put people before party. I am a Democrat and most of my ideals line up with the Democrat Party, but that doesn't mean my job as a representative is to further the Democratic Party. My job as a representative is to make sure that the people I represent are taken care of, whether that might be through legislation proposed by Democrats or proposed by Republicans or Independents. My job is to represent and care about the people I'm elected to represent. They are more important to me than party affiliation."

Q: How do you plan to help Native American tribes with your role in Congress?

A: Davids: "I think that there's a lot of room there for not only tribal interests but also the interests of folks who have to make decisions about the tribal federal trust responsibility. Having a member who is intimately aware of sovereignty and self-determination and the tribal federal trust responsibility can be really effective in terms of educating folks on those issues."

Haaland: "I'm always going to fight any decreases in funding. The U.S. government has a trust responsibility with tribes. Additionally, I want to make sure tribal leaders have an opportunity to have a seat at the table. When [House] Speaker [Paul] Ryan was passing the tax bill, tribal leaders wanted to speak on it and didn't have an opportunity. I'll fight very hard for that. It's a government to government relationship and they should have every opportunity to speak when these issues are being debated in the House. Native American tribes will be automatic allies when I'm elected. My door will always be open to the Seminole Tribe."

Douglas: "I really look forward to reaching out for support from the tribes and really finding out what issues they are looking to push forward. As far as committees outside of the Native American community, I'd like to serve and help the committee on education and the workforce, which specifically align with my desire to improve education. I also think it would be really interesting to look into the committee on ethics since that one is a non-partisan committee looking at ethics within governing bodies."

Q: How do you think the federal budget can be improved?

A: Davids: "One of the things I really think about a lot is equity in everything. Equity in the way we distribute our federal resources, equity in the way that programs are developed, and I think that it's a concept not enough of us understand. We talk about equality a lot, but equity is something that's starting to seep into the conversation a lot more. It's something I'd like to see more widely used, how we integrate equity into our policies, because I think that will be the key to us having true equality in this country."

Haaland: "We can make everyone pay their fair share. We've been subsidizing corporations on the low wages of workers. When I worked at a bakery, my boss could afford to give us raises and health care, paid leave. It's almost as if small business owners can't afford to do that anymore. We're giving these tax breaks to give the CEOs million-dollar bonuses. It's so inequitable; I cringe when I think about it. Tax breaks should go to small business owners to be able to give their employees health care and a living wage. There's no reason on earth that one should get millions of dollars of bonuses."

Douglas: "One of the things we struggle with here in Oklahoma is that about 15 percent of our bridges and like 26 percent of the roads are considered structurally deficient or in poor condition. My favorite statistic that I read recently is that on average Oklahomans spend more than $700 per year on maintaining their cars due to poor road conditions. I just had a rock fly up from the road and puncture the condenser on my radiator so now the air conditioning has gone out on my car and that's the second time that has happened with this vehicle, just because of the debris on the roadway. Part of the problem with that is that a lot of the funding for projects like that come from the federal motor fuel tax and that was determined like 25 years ago. It's not based on a percentage it's just a number percent of gallon per fuel sold so it hasn't really kept up as far as inflation's concerned and that's a big thing we need to address. ... We cannot continue with levies that are possibly going to fail if we have a heavy rain or have bridges that might fail while people are driving on them."

Miccosukee gaming revenue up for federal taxation

Attorney vows Supreme Court appeal

BY DAMON SCOTT
Staff Reporter

In a published decision June 4, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit affirmed a trial judge's previous decision that the federal government could collect taxes from Native American tribal casinos and from tribal members who receive disbursements from those casinos.

"When an Indian tribe decides to distribute the revenue from gaming activities ... the distributions are subject to federal taxes," wrote 11th Circuit Judge Gerald Tjoflat.

The ruling affirms a decision by Miami U.S. District Judge Cecilia Altonaga, that defendant Sally Jim and the Miccosukee Tribe can be held liable for unpaid taxes.

The decision involves a dispute that has been reported on for almost two decades. In 2001, the federal government learned that Jim failed to report or pay taxes on $272,000 in disbursements she received from the Tribe, which operates Miccosukee Indian Bingo and Gaming.

The government later learned that the Tribe had earned more than $32 million from its casino operations, and had failed to withhold any taxes, according to court documents.

The government argued that taxes were due under the 1988 Indian Gaming Revenue Act, which was enacted "to protect the Indian gaming industry from corruption and to provide for extensive federal oversight," the court said.

Jim and the Tribe have argued that the IGRA was superseded by the Tribal General Welfare Exclusion Act, which generally precludes taxation of tribal revenues.

But Altonaga and the 11th Circuit agreed with the government, saying that the TGWEA was not meant to override the IGRA.

"[P]er capita distribution of gaming revenue remains taxable income, even if the distribution arguably promotes the welfare of a tribe," Tjoflat said in the decision. "The distribution payments cannot qualify as Indian general welfare benefits under the TGWEA because Congress specifically subjected such distributions to federal taxation in IGRA."

Jim's attorney, Robert Saunooke, located in Miramar, maintains that tribes have the right to collect revenues and distribute those revenues as they see fit without being subjected to taxation.

"This is a very complex issue ... Suffice it to say that we are disappointed with the result and will be appealing to the U.S. Supreme Court. We are hopeful that some of the misleading language in the order will be clarified there," Saunooke said in an email to the Seminole Tribune.

Multiple attempts to reach the Miccosukee Tribe's attorney in this matter, George Abney of Atlanta's Alston & Bird, were unsuccessful.

Immokalee summer camp cooks up culture

Summer camp is more than games, sports and water fun. In Immokalee the campers also learned to cook a traditional Seminole meal in the cooking chickee June 13.

The day was plenty hot without the large fire raging under the grate in the chickee, but the kids endured the heat and successfully made a meal of spaghetti, macaroni and cheese, corn, green beans and fry bread. Boys gathered wood, girls made the fry bread and everyone enjoyed the meal together.

Photographs show historic Fort Marion woven into Florida's Native history

BY TARA BACKHOUSE
 Collections Manager, Ah-Tah-Thi-Ki Museum

The Museum's historic collection consists of many types of things, from 19th century newspapers to patchwork clothing, to sculpture and paintings. However, the majority of the objects we care for are photographs. We estimate we have 150,000 photographs that range from the early 20th century to the present day. You've no doubt seen some of our photographs in other articles, at community events, or at the Museum. We often publish articles to ask for help in gathering information about them. We'll echo that request here, but we also want to share a stunning comparison.

Some of the most interesting things we discover in the collection involve comparisons of objects separated by decades of time. For example, by comparing an early 20th century wooden doll to a brightly colored palmetto doll from the late 20th century, one can see how styles and materials changed, as well as how Seminole artistry developed over 100 years. Another type of comparison often happens in our library. Our 19th century newspapers usually tell a deplorable and terribly sad story of an expansionist war, genocide and racist propaganda. However a 20th century newspaper such as this one tells stories of success and highlights happy occasions.

We recently ran across one such pair of photographs. Both show Native American people at the Castillo de San Marcos in St. Augustine, AKA Fort Marion. The fort has a long history, as it was completed in 1695, and used by Spanish, British and United States forces throughout the 18th and 19th centuries, as each tried to wrestle control of Florida away from each other and the native populations who lived here. During the 19th century, many groups of and forcibly removed even further away from their homeland. The heartbreaking photograph below, which is a copy obtained from the Florida State Photographic Archives, shows one such group at the fort in 1875. This strong and resolute group of people look determined to survive this unjust

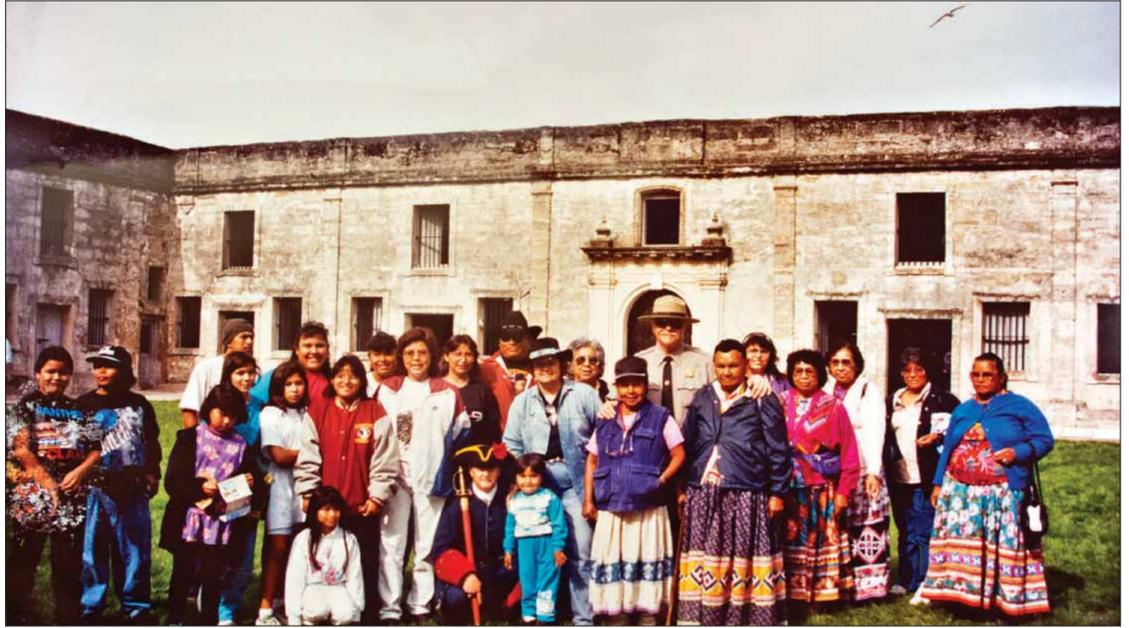

System, Castillo de San Marcos welcomes thousands of people every year to learn about its history, including the part it played in the Indian conflicts. The Seminole Tribe took a trip to Fort Marion on January 31, 1998 in order to trace the path of Osceola, one of the great heroes of the Seminole War. He was other trip? Were you perhaps there? This group of Seminole visitors probably found it hard to learn about the darker days of the fort. Nonetheless such a visit illustrates how much has changed since the conflicts of the 19th century. Endurance, adaptability and acumen have formed the 20th century

A large group of Kiowa, Cheyenne, Comanche, and Arapaho chiefs and warriors were detained by the United States Army as prisoners of war at Fort Marion from 1875 to 1878.

A group of modern-day visitors to the Castillo de San Marcos find a park ranger and historical interpreter dressed as a Spanish soldier happy to pose with them within the walls that once imprisoned their ancestors.

Native people, including Apache, Arapaho, Cheyenne, Comanche, Kiowa and Seminole found themselves imprisoned in the fort during various conflicts with the presiding government. The years from 1886 to 1887 saw nearly 500 Apache prisoners living there. The living conditions were not good, and many did not survive. Others were taken imprisonment, so far from their western homes.

In contrast, this next picture shows a very different group of visitors to the fort. No longer are the Seminole people or any other tribal groups subject to abuse and imprisonment there, and war no longer darkens its walls. As part of the National Park first imprisoned there before being moved to another prison in Charleston, SC where he died. In 1998, the STOF trip continued to Charleston to experience and honor Osceola's journey. It's possible that this picture was taken on that trip. However there may have been other organized trips to St. Augustine. Do any of our readers know about this or any with the community. We welcome questions, conversation and information. If you would like to help shine a light on history, come and work with us, there are volunteer and employment options here for you. Just contact the Museum at 863-902-1113, or stop by and see us anytime!

Seminole story. It's a good thing to see the smiles and prosperity in the modern photo, but many people think it's also good to remember the injustices and suffering of the past so they are not repeated. These photographs share the same stone wall backgrounds, and that presents both a haunting memory of the past and an optimistic view of the future. Part of the Museum's purpose is to find these stories and share them

The Vanguard School of Lake Wales

NOW ENROLLING FOR FALL 2018!

The Vanguard School is an independent, co-educational, boarding and day school for grades 6-12, for students who learn differently. Vanguard strives to ensure each student aspires to higher educational opportunities and independent life.

The Vanguard School's goal is to provide a safe learning environment, and an educational program that encourages pride in Native American heritage in an enriching multicultural atmosphere.

The Vanguard experience is designed to transform our students' potential into personal academic achievements. We guide our students toward success, and prepare them for college and beyond.

Most graduating Vanguard Students attend college or a vocational or trade program. Our graduates have gone to four year colleges, such as: Lynn University, Santa Fe College, Texas A&M University, Stetson University, Florida Southern College, and Florida Gulf Coast University.

Brighton rallies teens for community support

BY LI COHEN
Copy Editor

Despite the endless apps and websites available at their fingertips, officials say teenagers are more disconnected than ever from their mental and emotional health.

"We see a disconnect with teens being able to talk to their parents about issues and parents come in sometimes and say there's things coming up with their kids and they don't know how to talk to them about it," said Nichole Chapa, aftercare and prevention counselor at Brighton's Center for Behavioral Health.

To help local teenagers with their mental and emotional health, the Brighton Health Clinic launched a bi-weekly teen support group on June 18. Sessions will be held on the first and third Monday every month from 2 to 3 p.m. at the Center for Behavioral Health in Brighton.

The support group is open to Tribal teens from 13 to 19 years old to learn and practice social and coping skills, process emotions and receive feedback from their peers and health professionals. While teenagers will primarily run the group's dialogue, Chapa or another facilitator will always be present to ensure no bullying or negative comments happen during discussions. The Center for Behavioral Health will also occasionally bring in counselors or other speakers to discuss specific topics, such as depression or anxiety.

According to the National Institute of Mental Health, more than 3 million teenagers between the ages of 12 and 17 had at least one major depressive episode in 2016. Adolescent females were 13 percent more likely to be impacted than adolescent males.

"A lot of teens feel like they don't get a chance to speak very much, and even when they are speaking with their friends it's not really about anything too serious," Chapa said. "With friends, you usually talk about things more light-hearted, but if you have a group that is specifically for support, it could maybe allow them to feel like they can be more open, that they can talk more and feel more understood."

Chapa hopes that teens will quickly know that the support group is a judgement-free zone and that all discussions will be confidential.

"It's going to be a place where you can express yourself and make connections that you didn't know you could," she explained. "People tend to stay with their own groups and this could get people to see that there's support in the community they might not have had before."

The Mayo Clinic recommends that parents help prevent mental illness in children by encouraging them to develop friendships and social groups, stay physically active, reduce their electronic time, get enough sleep, and to seek help as soon as they begin experiencing depression symptoms.

If the support group is successful in Brighton, the Center for Behavioral Health plans to expand the support group to other reservations.

Make preparations for mosquito season

SUBMITTED BY BOB LAMENDOLA
Florida Department of Health Broward County

April and May showers bring June ... not flowers, mosquitoes.

After the heavy rains of May and subtropical storm Alberto, the biting bugs are back and you should protect your family.

The bug to watch for is the Aedes mosquito, a small, black one with white spots that lives close to people, right outside or inside your house. They specialize in biting humans, and stay active all day.

Aedes mosquitoes carry Zika virus and other tropical viruses such as chikungunya and dengue fever. So far this year, no locally transmitted cases of tropical diseases have been reported in South Florida but a few cases have been reported in people who traveled to countries where the diseases are present.

"Everyone should be aware of mosquitoes and take steps to protect themselves," says Dr. Paula Thaqi, director of the Florida Department of Health in Broward County. "The best way to do that is to avoid being bitten. We recommend a practice called Drain and Cover."

Drain standing water in and around the house.

Get rid of water that collects in garbage cans, tires, buckets, roof gutters, pool covers, coolers, toys, flower pots and plants with pockets, such as bromeliads. Discard items where rain or sprinkler water collects. Clean bird baths and pet water bowls twice a week.

Eliminate even puddles, because Aedes can breed in containers as small as a bottle cap. Aedes can even breed inside the home, in spots where water drips and collects.

Cover yourself and the openings in your home. If you go outdoors when mosquitoes are active, wear shoes, socks, long pants and long sleeves. Spray your skin and clothing with repellent containing DEET or other approved ingredients (check the label). Keep windows and doors closed, and repair damaged screening.

Cathy Newby appointed NB3 Foundation board chair

PRESS RELEASE

The Notah Begay III (NB3) Foundation announced in June that Cathy Newby, a member of the Diné (Navajo) Nation, is the foundation's new board of directors chair. Newby is the manager of tribal affairs for the PNM Governmental Affairs Department, New Mexico's largest electricity provider that serves more than 500,000 New Mexico residential and business customers. The NB3 Foundation's mission is to reduce childhood obesity and type 2 diabetes among Native American youth.

"The NB3 Foundation is honored to welcome Cathy to this leadership role on the board of directors," said NB3 Foundation President and CEO Justin Kii Huenemann. "Cathy knows New Mexico, tribes and Native communities well and has deep roots within the communities to help the Foundation continue to grow locally and nationally."

Newby has a bachelor's in communications and journalism from Eastern New Mexico University in Portales, New Mexico. She grew up on the Navajo Nation in Tohatchi, New Mexico.

Native Americans forgotten in national health data

BY SARAH LIESE
Native American Journalists Association

For years the Indigenous population have been excluded or underrepresented from national data, leading to lack of funding according to the Federal Data Collection in American Indian/Alaska Native Communities researched by National Congress of American Indians (NCAI) Policy Research Center.

Accurate data would allow for tribal leaders to better provide services to their citizens. NCAI stated that the inclusion of Native Americans in data could change federal budget planning, service provision, resource allocation and tribal eligibility for federal grants.

A 2017 report from the National Cancer Institute found that American cancer rates are declining overall, but that is not true for Native Americans.

Kristine Rhodes, CEO of the American Indian Cancer Foundation, spoke out against this inaccuracy at the 2017 Excellence in Journalism Conference during the Native health panel.

Rhodes corrected this report by including Native Americans to the study. She found that the Indigenous community had increasing cancer rates over the last 20 years. She also encouraged other health professionals to normalize that Natives are a part of the data.

"What I tell researchers and partners that we work with [is] if I see a chart and it has 'white, black and other,' I ask them to at least put in American Indian with an asterisk," Rhodes said. "We can't just continue to be invisible in these data pieces, and they need to be able to explain why they aren't including us."

Mark Trahan, a journalist and professor at the University of North Dakota, also found that Native Americans were out of mind for many medical professionals. Nearly eight years ago when Trahan was editor for the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, he had access to the top experts in the world and his questions regarding Native health shook them.

"These top experts would come in and at the end of every interview I would ask, 'How does this fit with the Indian health system?'" Trahan said. "And their faces would drop. It had never occurred to them."

American Indians account for 1.7 percent of the U.S. population. This tiny number, combined with a mistrust of data collection and federal government agencies by Native Americans increases the inclusion issues according to the (NCAI) Policy Research Center.

The Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation (ASPE) recognized the insufficient sample size, and suggests to increase the sample size, over-sample, collect multiple years of annually researched data, fund and perform studies to address the well-being of American Indians, and lastly, seek out partnerships with Native communities.

Language and geographic barriers such as poor roads or houses without addresses add to the number of challenges as well.

The ASPE responded to these barriers with a solution centered on reviewing sampling techniques. Their answer is to provide cost-effective identification for those not residing on reservations/homelands, increase rural sample sizes, oversample those living on Native homelands and come up with new approaches to maximize the use of existing data from rural areas while protecting privacy and confidentiality of respondents.

Freelance reporter Lenzy Krehbiel-Burton, a former correspondent for the Native Health News Alliance, noted that a reason Native Americans are missing from data is because the people conducting the survey may not be in a place with a notable Indigenous presence.

Krehbiel-Burton also suggested the answer is placing more boots on the ground to actively seek out Native Americans in the community.

"Because we are out of sight and out of mind, they don't necessarily think to ask about us," Krehbiel-Burton said. "It's going to take everybody speaking up and saying, 'Hey we're here, please don't forget about us.'"

Mallory Black, the Communication Editor for StrongHearts Native Helpline, spoke about the importance of Indigenous news organizations, such as the Native Health News Alliance, to aid in the inclusion of Indigenous people in health data.

"It's not necessarily advocating for these issues. It's about informing people about what the issues are, what the statistics and the data do show when they are available, but what solutions are happening in-house," Black said. "What solutions are being proposed by the communities themselves to respond to these issues, and what they're bringing to the table."

To move away from stereotypes, the Native health panel at the 2018 Nation Native Media Conference will focus on solutions rather than centering on beaten down statistics such as diabetes or heart disease. The goal is to zoom in on the heart of Native communities and see what tribal leaders are doing to address these issues.

One of the speakers at the Native media panel, Antonia Gonzales, is collaborating with the Solutions Journalism Network that is doing a series called State of Change, a group of newsrooms in New Mexico impacting rural communities. She is also interacting with the New Mexico in Focus for PBS covering health and wellness issues.

In those projects, Gonzales said they are wanting to include Native voices in mainstream media. She hopes to steer away from the "gloom and doom" of Indian Country by zooming in on grassroots members, Native programming, health services and traditional and western medicine solutions in order to bring the well-being and development of the Indigenous community to the forefront.

"Not only are reporting and our stories taking a look and examining what people are doing to overcome challenges, but it also means we are providing more information and getting more information out there on these issues," Gonzales said.

Swim healthy, stay healthy

SUBMITTED BY NICHOLAS PERSAUD
STOF Environmental Health Program

Swimming is a fun and a great way to stay healthy and spend time with family and friends. However, it's important not to swim or let your kids swim if they have diarrhea. Just one diarrheal incident in the water can release millions of diarrhea-causing germs like Crypto (short for Cryptosporidium), Giardia, Shigella, norovirus, and E. coli O157:H7. This can make other swimmers sick if they swallow a mouthful of contaminated water.

Most germs are killed within minutes by common pool disinfectants like chlorine or bromine, but Crypto is a germ that can survive in properly chlorinated water for more than seven days. This is why Crypto is the leading cause of outbreaks linked to swimming in the United States.

Tips for Healthy Swimming

Practicing healthy swimming is important to keep ourselves and our loved ones healthy. Whether in the pool, the hot tub/spa, or water playground we can all help protect ourselves and our loved ones from germs by following these simple but effective steps:

- Don't swim or let children swim when sick with diarrhea.
- Don't swallow the water.
- Take kids on bathroom breaks every hour.

- Check diapers, and change them in a bathroom or diaper-changing area – not poolside – to keep germs away from the pool.

- Shower before you get in the water. Rinsing off in the shower for just one minute helps get rid of any germs that might be on your body.

Prevent Injury

Drowning is a leading cause of unintentional injury death among children one to 14 years old. In fact, drowning kills more young children one to four years old than anything else except birth defects.

Of drowning victims who survive and are treated in emergency rooms, more than half are hospitalized or transferred for further care. They often experience brain damage, which can cause memory problems, learning disabilities, or permanent loss of basic functioning (or permanent vegetative state). Swimmers can prevent fatal and non-fatal drowning by learning swimming skills, by wearing life vests, and by swimming under the close supervision of parents, caregivers, or lifeguards who know cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR).

Remember: You can contact the STOF Fire Department for a schedule of free CPR Classes

The Environmental Health Program requests that you call the STOF Health Department with any pool related issues. We can be reached at 954-985-2330.

New Medicare cards coming

SUBMITTED BY PAUL ISAACS, MD
STOF Department of Health and Human Services

The Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS) will mail you a new Medicare card between April 2018 and April 2019. Medicare is removing your Social Security number from your card and is replacing it with a number that is unique to you. Your new Medicare number will contain a combination of numbers and uppercase letters. This change will help protect your identity.

Once you get your new card, safely and securely destroy your old card and start using your new card right away. Protect yourself by making sure no one can get your personal information from your old Medicare card.

Please make sure your mailing address with Medicare is up to date. If your address needs to be corrected, contact Social Security at ssa.gov/myaccount or 1-800-772-1213. TTY users can call 1-800-325-0778. You may also contact one of the medical social workers at the STOF Health Clinic for assistance in updating your address.

Beware of anyone who contacts you about your new Medicare card. CMS will never ask you to give them personal or private information to get your new Medicare number and card.

Mississippi Choctaw casinos will be first to offer sports betting

A string of casinos owned by the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians are likely to be the first in that state to offer sports betting.

The Mississippi Choctaw Tribal Council recently approved sports betting at the Silver Star Hotel and Casino, Golden Moon Hotel and Casino at Pearl River Resort and Bok Homa Casino. Choctaw officials anticipate being the first Native American tribe in the U.S. to offer sports betting, the Clarion Ledger reported.

Betting will be available for college and professional sporting events, as well as horse racing.

The move comes after the Supreme Court struck down the federal law banning sports betting. The ruling paved the way for nationwide wagering and several states moved quickly to institute sports betting.

The Choctaw tribe has not set a date for sports betting to begin, the Clarion Ledger reported, but are expected to introduce wagering before other Mississippi casinos because it is not subject to regulation by the state Gaming Commission. The tribe has cleared all regulatory issues, state officials said.

The Mississippi Gaming Commission has proposed rules for sports betting in 28-licensed casinos along the Mississippi River and the Gulf Coast, WREG-Memphis reported. Those rules could be adopted by June 21, with state-licensed casinos accepting bets as soon as July.

Existing regulations in Mississippi will limit sports betting there to casinos, which will pay state and local taxes worth 12 percent of the wagers, minus any payouts.

Idaho State Board of Education announces tuition reduction for Native American students

IDAHO FALLS – Members of Idaho's federally-recognized Native American tribes can attend Idaho State University for $60 per credit hour beginning this fall.

At the request of Idaho State University, the Idaho State Board of Education approved the pilot program at their monthly meeting in Idaho Falls on June 21. Members of the Shoshone-Bannock, Nez Perce, Shoshone-Paiute, Kootenai and Coeur d'Alene Tribes are eligible for the discounted tuition at ISU. Students must be degree-seeking, maintain satisfactory academic progress and apply for federal student financial aid through the FAFSA program to be eligible. The discounted rate includes tuition, but other class fees will still apply.

"We are working with the Shoshone-Bannock Tribes to update our memorandum of understanding and build upon our existing relationship," said ISU Provost and Executive Vice President Laura Woodworth-Ney in a news release. "The announcement helps to remove financial barriers to education for students in our Southeast Idaho community."

For an Idaho student taking 12 credits, the cost of tuition is currently $3,710 per semester at ISU. Under the new program, Native American students will pay $720.

Shoshone-Bannock Tribes Vice Chairman Ladd Edmo and tribal member college students, Sidney Fellows and Galen Edmo, testified in support of reducing costs and making college more affordable to tribal members.

"We have almost 6,000 Tribal members and we have the largest number of enrolled tribal members who attend Idaho colleges and universities," Edmo said in a news release. "This proposal would work to correct the education disparities within the State of Idaho and specifically for the Tribal members of my Tribe."

Idaho State University is working with the Shoshone-Bannock Tribes to finalize the details, including the application process and outreach to the Tribal membership.

"We support the state's efforts to improve access to higher education and this decision will make a difference for many in our state," said ISU President Kevin Satterlee.

USU receives $1 million grant to create Native American inclusivity program

Utah State University received a million-dollar grant in June from the Howard Hughes Medical Institute to create the new Mentoring and Encouraging Student Academic Success program to better support Native American students transferring to USU Logan from the USU Blanding campus.

"The Howard Hughes Medical Institute's Inclusive Excellence Program is intended to reduce the barriers to inclusion by students who might otherwise have challenges integrating into four-year programs in STEM areas," said Al Savitzky, professor and department head in the department of biology at Utah State University and one of the leaders of this new program.

Savitzky said Native Americans are underrepresented in STEM and higher education nationwide.

"The latest statistics that we have from the National Science Foundation indicate that Native Americans represent only one percent of undergraduate students across the country and they represent less than half of one percent of graduate students in STEM disciplines."

The goal of this inclusivity program is to create a supportive and encouraging environment for Native American transfer students.

"Really the Hughes program in general is focused on improving institutional cultures and generating a more inclusive environment and so one of the first things we're going to have is a cultural competency training program that ... will assist both faculty and others on the Logan campus in being more aware of and more sensitive to the cultural differences between the students from Blanding and students here in Logan," Savitzky said.

The program has additional support to promote academic success for these Native American students.

"We will be providing a full-time faculty level advocate for the students who will be able to track those students academic progress."

Savitzky echoes USU's delight at this excellent opportunity to promote Native American representation in higher education.

Lheidli T'enneh First Nation votes no to government treaty

Members of the Lheidli T'enneh First Nation in north-central British Columbia, Canada, have voted against a treaty that would have provided them with land, resource rights and the power to self-govern.

The proposed treaty with the federal and provincial governments was rejected June 23. If ratified, the Lheidli T'enneh First Nation would have received 4,330 hectares of land, a lump payment of $37 million and resource revenue sharing.

It would have also taken the First Nation out of the Indian Act and established self-government.

"Of course it is disappointing, but the people have spoken and we must honour their wishes," said Chief Dominic Frederick in a statement.

Had the First Nation voted in favour of the treaty and self-government, it would have been able to collect taxes on its land and set rules around citizenship.

"We must now try and move forward with the limited resources and opportunities available while we remain under the Indian Act," said Frederick.

David Luggi, former chief of the Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, which represents several First Nations neighbouring the Lheidli T'enneh, was against the treaty.

Luggi said the Lheidli T'enneh are entitled to more than 15,000 square kilometres of territory, not just the 4,330 hectares proposed in the treaty.

B.C.'s Indigenous Relations and Reconciliation Minister Scott Fraser said he respects the democratic decision made by the Lheidli T'enneh.

"We will continue to work government to government with Lheidli T'enneh on long-term reconciliation and self-determination in ways that work for their community," said Fraser in a statement.

There are approximately 600 members of the Lheidli T'enneh Nation, most of whom live in the Prince George area, but also scattered throughout western Canada and the U.S.

Remains of three of four American Indian children returned to families after disinterment

Nearly two weeks after they began the disinterment of four students who died more than 100 years ago while attending the Carlisle Indian School, the remains of three of those children have been returned to their families.

The Army National Military Cemeteries team, which began the disinterment process June 13 at the Carlisle Barracks cemetery, said June 25 they are confident in their findings that the remains they found are consistent with Little Plume of the Northern Arapaho; George Ell of the Blackfeet; and Herbert J. Little Hawk of the Oglala Sioux.

The remains were formally transferred to the respective families in a private ceremony, said Karen Durham-Aguilera, Executive Director of Army National Military Cemeteries.

"We are honored and privileged that the Army had the opportunity to transfer the Native American children's remains from Carlisle Barracks Post Cemetery to their families," she said. "We hope these dignified disinterments allow the families to find some measure of peace and healing."

The disinterment that had been scheduled for Dora Brave Bull was postponed at the request of the family until more ancestry information becomes available.

The families had requested this second round of disinterments. Last year, archaeologists and anthropologists disinterred three Northern Arapaho children. While they returned two of the sets of remains to their families, the remains in Little Plume's grave were not consistent with the age he would have been when he died.

This year, the team is confident the remains they found belong to Little Plume, along with George Ell and Herbert J. Little Hawk.

Additionally, in Herbert Little Hawk's grave, the team found a third elbow bone, which was re-interred in a private ceremony. The group held a press conference June 26 to reveal more of their findings.

The Carlisle Indian School operated from 1879 to 1918. Some students who attended had been captured and forced to attend. Others were sent to the school by their tribes following negotiations between the chiefs and the U.S. government. Still others, whose parents had attended, went voluntarily to learn how to read, write and speak English.

It was often a difficult and traumatic transition from tribal life to the military-style regimen of the Carlisle Indian School. The children's traditional clothing was replaced with uniforms. Their hair was cut, they were forbidden to speak their language or practice their customs and they took on new names.

Roughly 180 children from 50 different tribes and nations are buried at the Carlisle Barracks.

High Court takes up Native American tax case

The state of Washington will head to the U.S. Supreme Court next term for the right to tax a fuel distributor owned by a Native American tribe.

As noted in the state's petition for certiorari, Cougar Den is owned by the Yakama Indian Nation but imports millions of gallons of fuel into Washington every year for sale to the general public.

The Yakama's 1855 treaty with the United States gave the tribe the right to travel upon all public highways, but Ninth Circuit precedent holds that such language does not exempt the Yakama from taxes or state fees on off-reservation commercial activities.

Washington says the language is limited to ensuring that tribal members do not pay a fee to travel on public highways, but the Washington Supreme Court ruled last year that it means states cannot tax Yakama trade that requires the use of public roads.

Per its custom the U.S. Supreme Court did not issue any comment June 25 in taking up the case.

Washington Solicitor General Noah Purcell represents the state. Stokes Lawrence attorney Matthew Harrington represents Cougar Den.

Connecticut casino wins crucial local zoning approval

EAST WINDSOR, Conn. – Plans for the state's first casino off a tribal reservation won a crucial local zoning permit June 19, but the future of the $300 million gambling venue remains uncertain because it still lacks a critical signoff from federal regulators.

East Windsor's planning and zoning commission unanimously granted a zoning permit for the development proposed by MMCT Venture LLC, a partnership of the tribal operators of Foxwoods Resort Casino and Mohegan Sun.

The venue — to be built on the site of the demolished Showcase Cinema movie theater off I-91 — is intended to blunt the competitive impact of a new, $960 million casino in Springfield on revenue and jobs tied to Connecticut's gambling industry. MGM Springfield opens Aug. 24.

If construction begins this fall, the East Windsor casino would not open until the spring of 2020. Initially, the tribes had hoped to beat the opening of MGM Springfield, but the project was delayed by a longer than expected site search.

"We've taken a huge step tonight," Joseph Ouellette, the planning commission's chairman, said after the vote. "We're almost over the finish line as far as the local approval process."

Commission members praised the project as significant economic development for a town that has struggled to build its tax base and attract visitors to patronize local businesses. The casino also would replace a long-vacant eyesore, they said.

The June 19 approval comes as the Mashantucket Pequot and Mohegan tribes wait for federal regulators to publish a notice that would legally assure the state that the expansion of casino gambling off tribal lands would not affect its revenue-sharing agreements with the two tribes.

The notice was published for the Mohegans on May 31, and a companion for the Mashantucket Pequots was expected soon after, but it has yet to surface. The federal regulator, the U.S. Department of the Interior's Bureau of Indian Affairs, has not responded to multiple requests for comment.

A signoff by the federal government was required by the state law authorizing the expansion to East Windsor.

Chinook Indian tribe, seeking recognition, advances with lawsuit

TACOMA, Wash. – A federal judge says a Native American tribe can proceed with seven of eight legal claims as part of its long effort to gain federal recognition as a tribe.

Oregon Public Broadcasting reports the Chinook Indian Nation, whose members historically lived at the mouth of the Columbia River, sued the Interior Department and other agencies in August.

U.S. District Court Judge Ronald Leighton dismissed one claim June 20, saying the courts couldn't grant the tribe federal status because it was a question for other government branches.

But he allowed the tribe to move ahead with other claims, including that it should have access to federal money awarded in 1970 as compensation for tribal lands the U.S. took in the 1850s.

The tribe has been fighting for federal recognition, which would allow it to establish a reservation and gain native fighting rights.

Tribal affairs agencies make progress, not enough to satisfy senators

WASHINGTON – Federal agencies that oversee Indian affairs are making progress toward fixing management shortcomings that landed them on a list of "high-risk" agencies, but not enough progress to satisfy some senators.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs, Bureau of Indian Education and Indian Health Services have for years been on the Government Accountability Office's high-risk list of federal programs that are vulnerable to mismanagement.

Officials from those agencies told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee on June 13 that they are now meeting, or at least beginning to meet, GAO recommendations for improved operations. But senators, and other witnesses, said the agencies still have a way to go.

"Based on some recent information from the agencies, there has been some progress from the Bureau of Indian Education and the Indian Health Services," said Sen. John Hoeven, R-North Dakota, the committee chairman. "Over the past year, we have seen very little progress in implementing Indian energy."

Sen. Tom Udall, D-New Mexico, questioned whether officials are really changing the culture of their agencies or merely "checking off boxes."

"The federal government has trusted treaty obligations to provide vital services to American Indian and Alaska Native tribes," said Udall, the ranking Democrat on the committee. "GAO's review of Indian programs ensure our government is living up to and respecting those obligations ... especially those on the high-risk list."

Frank Rusco, director of natural resources and environment at the GAO, said there has been progress. He pointed to the BIA – which has met frequently with the committee over last nine months – noting that the agency has closed nearly a third of the GAO's 14 recommendations for improvement.

"We identified most, if not all, progress meeting this criteria," Rusco said. "Still, additional progress is required in all areas, particularly in the areas of leadership, commitment and the capacity and resources needed to identify and address root causes."

Rusco said one problem has been a high rate of turnover in BIA leadership positions. The issue of high rates of job vacancies was echoed by many of the other speakers.

While BIE Director Tony Dearman said his agency has closed seven of its 13 recommendations to improve school management and is making progress on the rest, Hoeven chided the agency for a large number of unfilled positions.

Dearman said that "location and isolation of our positions" has posed a problem for recruiting.

"We're really working with the department to move some of those positions out of D.C., because we've heard from tribal leadership that we need those acquisitions," Dearman said. "We're really anticipating by relocating the ... positions, we're going to recruit and be able to hire some."

High numbers of job vacancies at IHS has also led to long patient wait times, lack of organizational capacity, and lack of effective monitoring of health care centers and hospitals across the system, said Rear Adm. Michael Weahkee, the acting director of the agency.

"Reducing wait times continues to be a priority for the agency," said Weahkee, in testimony prepared for the hearing. "The OQ (Office of Quality) will ensure that quality is integrated into all agency programs in a collaborative and organized manner."

Udall said fulfilling the GAO recommendations is not enough, saying he wants to see evidence of a culture shift and institutional change to remove the high-risk designation.

"Year after year, tribal communities report gaps in federal programs, and in response our federal partners point to workforce turnover and lack of resources as the source of programs' ineffectiveness," he said. "We must do better."

Sacred artifacts stolen from a Native American tribe are finally returned over 100 years later

For members of the Chugach tribe in Alaska, ancient artifacts are all they have left. The invaluable remnants are testament to their rich history, their sense of belonging, their culture.

But hundreds of years of explorers ripping through their lands and stealing their history has left these items scattered across the world.

Thankfully, this is beginning to change. Nine sacred artifacts that an explorer plundered from the tribe in the 1800s, including burial masks and a cradle, are finally returning home after being stored at a museum in Germany.

"It's so important to keep our culture alive and vibrant," John Johnson from the Chugach Alaska Corporation told CNN. The corporation owns part of the tribe's assets and works to maintain financial independence for Alaskan natives. "So many of our artifacts are scattered around the world."

But getting items like this back doesn't just happen overnight.

The Chugach tribe has occupied the area around Prince William Sound in Alaska for thousands of years. The tribe currently has more than 4,000 people, including original members and descendants. Stories of the tribe's origins have been passed down from generation to generation.

Tribe members say the name Chugach originally came from native hunters exploring the area around the sound. To them, it looked like mountains were coming out of the glacial ice covering the sound. The hunters headed that way, crying out "Chuga, chu-ga," meaning "hurry, hurry." When they settled in the area, they named the tribe Chugach.

Stories like these can be passed down through words. But artifacts, which also show tribal ancestors' ways of life, can't.

"A lot of these things have a real strong religious and spiritual meaning ... and this will help to teach the younger generation and help keep our culture alive and intact," Johnson said.

The tribe's elders are very particular about how sacred objects are treated. And when the tribe doesn't have control over the artifacts, they aren't being treated with the respect the tribe believes they deserve, he said.

Among the items that were just returned are a cradle that once held a mummified baby and traditional burial masks. An explorer stole them from the Chugach tribe's lands in the 1880s. They had been at the Ethnographic Museum in Berlin.

Museums often hate to give up parts of their collections. So Johnson, from the Chugach Alaska Corporation, says he's excited that Berlin did.

Johnson believes museums gain "100 percent more knowledge" by returning these artifacts and engaging with the tribes than they would if they left the items sitting in a box.

"If museums go out of their way to be honorable and work with the tribes ... they have such unbelievable cultural exchange opportunities that can happen."

Once the objects arrive in the US, the corporation will work with local Native American villages to decide what to do with them.

U.S. House candidate from South Dakota calls for ending Indian reservations

A Republican candidate for South Dakota's U.S. House seat is calling for an end to the reservation system for Native Americans.

Neal Tapio, a state senator from Watertown, said the current system in which Indian tribes are sovereign entities within designated trust lands is a system that has failed generations of Native Americans. Tapio said the majority of people living on reservations are victims of "incest and molestation" leading to welfare dependence, despair and high suicide rates.

"To continue down the same path is simply wrong," Tapio said in a telephone interview. "We need to address the system, not just the symptoms. We need to renegotiate the treaties that are holding down a once very proud people."

There are nine federally recognized tribes in South Dakota. Nationally, there are 573 tribes on 326 land areas recognized as reservations, according to the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Tribes hold more than 56 million acres of land in trust.

South Dakota's reservations are among the poorest places in the United States. But Steve Emery, the secretary of the South Dakota Department of Tribal Relations and an enrolled member of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe, said Tapio's proposal would be deeply unpopular in Indian Country.

"I know that both tribal members and tribal governments in the state would be very opposed to it," Emery said.

Ending the reservation system would entail breaking treaties that the federal government signed with tribes. Congress has the power to pass legislation superseding those treaties.

Tapio said he hadn't spoken with tribal leaders about his proposal, but felt it was important to start a conversation as tribal leaders and the state officials hadn't done enough to improve conditions on the reservation.

"I'm not saying that I have the answers, but I'm saying we have to start down a completely different path," Tapio said.

Tapio's opponent Dusty Johnson said he agrees that the reservation system is not working, but he believes it's important for the U.S. government to work with the tribes rather than acting unilaterally. The country, he added, has moral and legal obligations to Native Americans.

"The reservation system doesn't work," Johnson said. "It's a failure of American socialism. In that way, reform is clearly needed."

Ahfachkee graduates take the stage

BY BEVERLY BIDNEY
Staff Reporter

BIG CYPRESS — The Ahfachkee School graduation May 24 was an intimate affair; just one high school graduate, Eyanna Billie, and one general education diploma (GED) graduate, Elisah Billie, proudly walked down the aisle to claim their diplomas.

The Herman Osceola Gym showed no sign of the boisterous youth and adults who usually inhabit the hardwood. Instead, it was transformed into a luxurious space thanks to many yards of drapery, soft lighting and flower arrangements on the tables. Those tables were filled with the loved ones of these two young adults, who were about to step into the adult world.

"It's an honor and a blessing to be here for this life changing event," said Sue Jane Cypress, who gave the opening prayer. "Be humble but not invisible and God bless each of you."

Big Cypress dignitaries also congratulated them on their achievement.

"This is a night you will always remember," said Big Cypress Councilman Mondo Tiger. "I'm so proud of you, now get the rest of your education and come back and help the Tribe."

"This is a small class, but a proud one," added Big Cypress Board Rep. Joe Frank.

Ahfachkee School Principal Dorothy Cain congratulates Elisah Billie and Eyanna Billie during the school's graduation May 24 at the Herman Osceola Gym in Big Cypress.

"This is a start, but you have a long way to go. We are fortunate that we have the resources to help you achieve your goals. Aim high."

A h f a c h k e e principal Dorothy Cain told the former students she was proud of their dedication, perseverance and hard work to get an education.

"Education gives us knowledge of the world around us and gives us the perspective to build opinions," she said. "Dream big, do something that tugs at your heart; you owe it to yourself to make your days count. Push yourself. With determination and the right tools, you can do great things."

The keynote address was given by

Lee Zepeda, the Tribe's executive director of administration. He told them the world is full of distractions, so they must stay focused.

"The future doesn't just happen by accident," Zepeda said. "Choose your calling, not just a career. Don't let others make that choice for you. The road to the future is not considered important in their lives.

English teacher Dr. Rona Olukolu presented Eyanna with the school's Warrior Award, which is given to a graduate who exhibits strength and endurance.

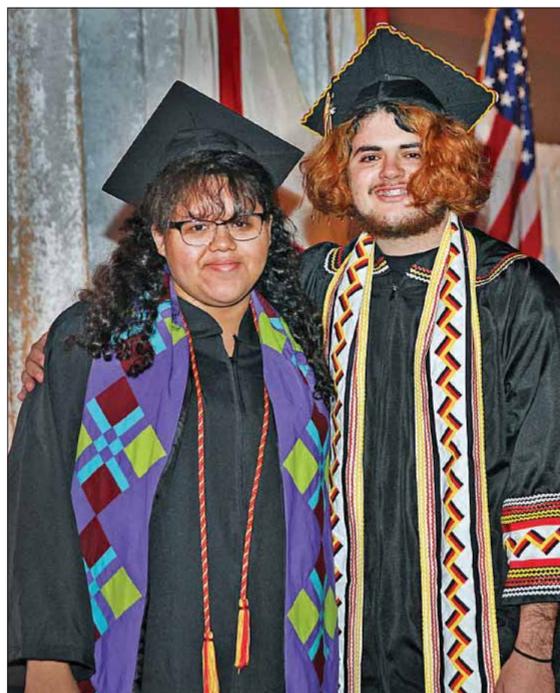

"Eyanna, you said you had to grow up quickly to be an example to your siblings," Olukolu said. "I admire how you used the pitfalls in life as a motivational force. You have toiled, you were tried and tested, but you prevailed and never gave up. You remained focused and committed to your purpose."

Olukolu ended her remarks with a quote from author Dan Millman, "A warrior does not give up what he loves; he finds the love in what he does." With that, she presented the school's highest award to Eyanna, who addressed the crowd.

"Some of us don't see education as essential," Eyanna said. "We should value it and show our appreciation. If you utilize our blessings wisely, many more of us can graduate and be a service to the community. We are the leaders of tomorrow and we must be ready. We need to educate ourselves to sustain the Tribe and our resources."

Cain awarded the diplomas as dignitaries and teachers lined up to shake Eyanna and Elisah's hands. A video of Eyanna was played, in which she said she was the first in her family to graduate high school and go to college. She will attend California College of the Arts in Oakland.

"I like to be the first to do stuff," she said in the video. "I hope all my siblings go for higher education."

Energy surge marks end of school year in Brighton

BY DAMON SCOTT

BRIGHTON — A Hawaiian theme filled the Pemayetv Emahakv Charter School gymnasium June 1 as students participated in end-of-year activities with teachers and staff in Brighton.

Among the glow necklaces, beach balls, (plastic) grass skirts and inflatable palm trees were groups of the 308 students in all grades at the school who made their way in and out of the gym for fun and dances.

"We call it 'Survivor Luau' because they all survived taking the [FSA] test," said Michele Thomas, administrative assistant at PECS. "It's just a fun way to celebrate the end of the test and the school year."

Students participated in line dancing (complete with the Macarena), a hula-hoop contest, limbo line and a basketball shooting game, among other fun activities.

PECS culture instructor Jade Osceola was the "cruise director" for the day's festivities. Dressed in a Hawaiian shirt and pink hat, she emceed the event and led the kids through their dances and friendly competitions.

Starting bright and early at 8:20 a.m., students from the middle school took to the gym floor to do their dance, followed by the third, fourth and fifth grades.

Once those students wrapped up activities at the gym, the eighth-graders prepared for their campus walk thru, passing by the classrooms of all the other grades around the school. The kids cheered them on as they walked around campus to the PECS Media Center for a reception and slideshow.

PECS is in its 11th year of operation. Construction began in the fall of 2006 and the doors opened in August 2007 to 123 students. In August 2010, PECS became a K-8 grade school.

Class of 2018

The Class of 2018 has made it known that they are destined for greatness. This year's graduating class is filled with future doctors, artists, educators and entrepreneurs who are ready to broaden their horizons and dive full-force into taking their industries by storm. The Seminole Tribune wishes the Class of 2018 the best of luck in their future endeavors.

Camryn Thomas

Lake Placid High School

Camryn will attend Abraham Baldwin Agricultural College in Tifton, Georgia, where she will study agricultural education. After earning an associate's degree, she plans to transfer to the University of Florida to study agricultural business. Ultimately, Camryn would like to teach. She was inspired by her high school agriculture teacher and the 4-H program.

Ivess Baker

Moore Haven High School

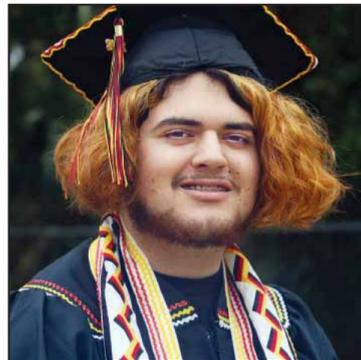

Ivess has worked on cars most of his life and plans to carry that on to Immokalee Technical College where he will learn to become a diesel mechanic. Ivess's favorite memory from high school was playing baseball and basketball.

Elizabeth Frank

Nova Southeastern University School

Elizabeth will attend High Point University in North Carolina where she will major in biology. She hopes to become a cardiovascular or neuro surgeon and looks forward to working with cadavers. Her teacher Mr. Northrop motivated her to finish high school, attend college and succeed in life.

Elisah Billie

GED

Elisah plans to attend Broward College and study clothing design with an eye toward producing his own line of unique skate wear that stands out. He likes to express himself with art, and while in high school, he learned not to judge people for their expressions and not to worry about those who may judge him. He's inspired by his mother Shani Billie and the rest of his family.

Eyanna Billie

Ahfachkee School

Eyanna will attend the California College of the Arts in Oakland to study illustration. Her goal is to create her own characters, comic books and television shows. She plans to carry her biggest lesson from high school with her to California, which is that not everything will go her way and she has to endure through that. She is inspired by her mother Eldean Billie and stepmother Jocelyn Billie, both of whom encourage her to do what she needs to do make sure her dreams come true.

Maia Shore

Thornton High School, Colorado

Maia plans to attend Arizona State University and major in forensic science. She said one of the reasons she chose ASU is that her uncle lives nearby and she really likes the school. Her favorite high school memory is running with the cross country team, which she was very close to. Her older brother Ryan inspired her to finish high school. She is looking forward to meeting new people in Arizona.

Sean Osceola

Okeechobee High School

Sean has signed to play baseball at Pasco-Hernando State College in New Port Richey. While there, he plans to study psychology. He is inspired by his parents Reno and Kelli Osceola, as they taught him to work hard and never give up on his goals. Sean's favorite high school memory was being part of the baseball team's surprising postseason run this year. He was the starting pitcher in a few upsets as the Brahms reached the regional finals.

Rodolfo Juarez

Okeechobee High School

Rodolfo, who fell in love with the theater in high school and says he is most himself in front of a large crowd, will study theater at Florida International University. The biggest lesson he learned in high school is that being yourself will lead you to your closest group of friends. Rodolfo is inspired by his mother Wendy Snow, who has always been supportive.

Demetric Billie

Micosukee Indian School

Demetric plans to take a year off to work around the Trail Reservation honing his skills and research trade schools. He plans to travel around the U.S. and hopefully other parts of the world. His mother and grandmother inspired him to finish high school, as did Lymire Marie, a teacher and administrator at MIS. Demetric's favorite memory was seeing the 2017 seniors graduate and going to the National Science Teachers Association with his science teachers his junior year in Los Angeles.

Jessi Harmon

Flagstaff High School, Arizona

Jessi will attend Virginia Military Institute to play Division 1 soccer and major in history and international studies with a minor in modern languages. She will attend on an NROTC Marine Option Scholarship and will be commissioned as a second lieutenant in the U.S. Marine Corps after graduating from VMI. Her favorite memory is being the only girl on her high school's football team. She wants to take advantage of educational opportunities, travel and grow as an individual.

Trinity Bowers

Nova Southeastern University School

Trinity plans to continue with the NSU community and attend Nova Southeastern University to study English and library services and hopes to become a librarian. Trinity believes college is a good opportunity and is looking forward to the feeling of accomplishment graduating will provide. During high school, she learned that it's always good to ask for help and take breaks when they're needed.

Pernell Bert

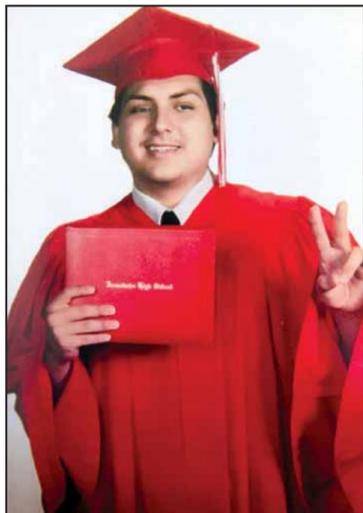

Okeechobee High School

Pernell plans to join the United States Marine Corps. His best memory of high school is playing on the tennis team. Pernell is inspired by those around him and says that he is always learning from the different ways people solve problems.

Class of 2018

◆◆◆ IN MEMORIAM ◆◆◆ Jon Jimmie

Jon Jimmie would have graduated with his class at Immokalee High School on May 25, but he passed away in February. This letter from his mother Elsa Zamora, on behalf of the entire family, including father Jonnie Jimmie and their son and daughters, is a loving tribute to him. Jon would have turned 19 on June 15.

To my son Jon,

Congratulations, you finally graduated. Son, I am so proud of you. Having you here with us for 18 years was a blessing from God. Although we miss your smile, along with your laughter and hugs, you left us with beautiful memories. These photos remind us of how handsome you looked, but you were also a gentleman with a kind heart who often helped others. Fishing and basketball may be your sports, but I was told that every time we hear thunder it is you playing basketball.

Happy Birthday my little Native son Jon Jimmie. We love you and miss you.

Jalynn Jones Okeechobee High School

Jalynn will attend Indian River State College and study graphic design. She enjoys drawing and wants to learn more about the technology used in graphic design. Jalynn isn't only motivated by a post-secondary course of study, she also wants to learn to speak Creek fluently. Jalynn's mother Ginger Jones, who works in the PECS Creek immersion program, inspires her because she never gives up, no matter how difficult her task may be.

Aldricia Cypress Immokalee High School

Aldricia plans to attend Immokalee Technical College and study early childhood education. She would like to open a day care center and work with children. Her favorite high school memory is having her baby, Marhz. Even though he's three months old, she says he has an old soul and inspires her.

Nicole Slavik Seacrest Country Day School

Nicole will attend Lesley University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, to study fine arts and graphic design. She isn't sure what career path she will take, but she wants to represent the Tribe and show her Native American voice through art. She is considering art therapy, being an art teacher or a graphic artist as career choices. The biggest lesson Nicole learned in high school was to look past people's differences and is inspired by the artist Gustavo Rimada, whose art blows her away.

Gherri Osceola Immokalee High School

Gherri will attend Florida Gulf Coast University for pre-med. She's always been fascinated with how medicine interacts with the body and one of her high school teachers inspired her to pursue the medical field. The most important lesson she learned in high school is time management and her favorite memory is going to high school events and spending time with her best friends. Gherri's mother Geraldine Osceola and her sisters inspire her to be better.

Layne Thomas Okeechobee High School

Layne plans to go to Indian River State College for an associate's degree and then transfer to Florida State University or Florida Gulf Coast University to study business administration. A physical fitness enthusiast, Layne hopes to be a physical therapist, a trainer or open a gym. In high school he learned to not let the little things pass him by, as those are the things that matter. His father Jason inspires him and is the biggest role model in his life because of his hard work.

Kalani Bankston Nova Southeastern University School

Kalani is moving to Syracuse, New York, to study biology at Syracuse University. Eventually, Kalani would like to focus on genetics and was inspired to pursue the sciences by his high school chemistry teacher Mr. Boulos. Along with his teacher's encouragement, Kalani was motivated to finish high school and pursue college because neither of his parents went to college and they pushed him to seize the opportunity.

Franklin Jumper GED

In the fall, Franklin will begin his college career learning woodworking and carpentry at Broward College, although in the future he hopes to get a music degree. Even though he didn't attend Ahfachkee for his senior year, his favorite school memory was going to the school's prom. Franklin's mom and older brother inspired him to obtain his GED and the dedication and perseverance he learned along the way is a lesson he will carry with him into college.

Leatrice Cypress-Cummings Immokalee High School

Leatrice would like to go to Florida State College and then possibly Haskell Indian Nations University to study Tribal government, as she hopes to be the first female president of the Tribe. While in high school, Leatrice learned that God always has a plan and that every barrier can be broken. She is inspired by her one-year-old son Kenai, who she says is full of life and encourages her to wake up every day and be happy.

Adrienne Bell GED, Oklahoma

Adrienne will attend Sheridan Technical College in Hollywood for culinary arts and hospitality management and will also pursue a bachelor's in entrepreneurship. She hopes to own a business and expand her sewing ventures to create traditional Seminole clothes. Her favorite high school memory is attending the pep rallies, where she said she was the loudest student singing all the songs. Adrienne's mother inspired her to finish school and gave her a needed "push."

Morgan King Okeechobee High School

Morgan plans to attend either Indian River State College or South Florida State College in Avon Park, where he will study business. He would like to one day turn his interest in golf into a business, possibly designing golf clubs. The biggest lesson Morgan learned in high school is to never work under pressure and stay on top of your work. His inspiration comes from his father Gilbert King, who he says is always there for him through the good and bad and keeps him humble.

Class of 2018

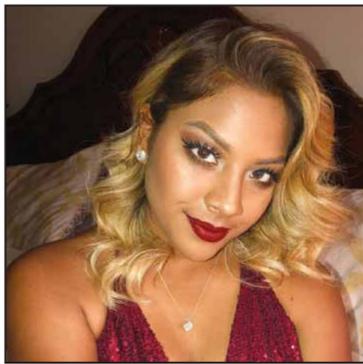

Julian Yescas
Fork Union Military Academy, Virginia

Julian will attend Lynn University in Boca Raton to study biology and run cross country and track. Julian's favorite high school memories are graduation and winning the state championship. His parents, friends and mentors inspired him to finish high school and go to college. Julian is looking forward to running cross country and track for Lynn University while he decides on future career plans.

Samuel Sanchez
Fort Gibson High School, Oklahoma

Now that Sammy has graduated, he wants to enjoy the summer in Florida while preparing to attend Oklahoma State University and major in psychology. He says a big reason he chose OSU is because the school offered him a chance to play football. His favorite high school memory is playing football with his older brother Jesse. Sammy's inspiration to finish high school and attend college came from his mom Alicia Cabal and stepdad Frank Cabal, coach Sammy Johnson and older siblings.

Amya Baxley
John Carroll High School

Amya plans to become a cosmetologist and will start beauty school in August at the Boca Beauty Academy in Boca Raton. Her goal is to own her own salon to help make other people feel and look beautiful every day. Amya said her parents inspired her to finish high school. Her favorite high school memories are when she hit her first homerun in a softball game her senior year and when her mom, sister and boyfriend attended her graduation.

Carrisa Colon
Miami Palmetto Senior High School

Carrisa said she plans to do some traveling first and then possibly attend Manatee Technical College. She'd eventually like to own a small business of some kind after college. Her favorite high school memory is saying goodbye to teachers and friends, although it was "bittersweet." Her family, friends and late brother inspired her to finish high school. She is looking forward to meeting new people, seeing new places and experiencing new opportunities.

Seminoles sign their names to final structural beam for Hollywood's new guitar-shaped hotel

BY KEVIN JOHNSON & BEVERLY BIDNEY
Senior Editor & Staff Reporter

A whitewashed steel beam has been making its way from reservation to reservation from June 18 to July 3 to give all Tribal members the opportunity to sign it. The beam will be the last one erected in the structure of the guitar-shaped Seminole Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Hollywood. A topping off ceremony will be held July 9 to commemorate the milestone.

The beam's first stop was the Brighton Reservation, where it arrived June 18 at the Fred Smith Rodeo Arena.

Arena manager Marvin Hines guided assistant manager Chester Surls as he lowered the 20-foot beam from a tractor onto two metal sawhorses.

Seminole Tribal Gaming Commission Chairman and Tribal member Allen Huff, of Brighton, was the first person to sign the beam. He said it's a great idea to have Tribal members sign the beam for the Guitar Tower.

"Having all the Tribal members being a part of it is really neat. It tells them 'I'm a part of this,'" Huff said.

"Pretty awesome" is how Billie Tiger described the Guitar Tower after she signed the beam.

After three days in Brighton, the beam shifted over to Immokalee on June 21, 22 and 25 and then Big Cypress for three days before it was scheduled to return to Hollywood at the end of June for its final stop as part of the $1.5 billion casino, dining, entertainment, hotel and retail expansion.

It has long been a tradition when constructing a building to mark the "topping off" of the structure with a ceremony when the last beam is put in place, signifying the building is structurally complete.

The practice began in ancient Scandinavia when a tree was placed atop a building to appease tree-dwelling spirits who may have been disturbed during construction. Today the topping out ceremony is common throughout the world with trees, flags or streamers attached to the last beam.

Seminole Tribal Gaming Commission Chairman Allen Huff is the first person to sign the structural beam upon its arrival June 18 at Fred Smith Rodeo Arena on the Brighton Reservation. The beam will be part of the new 450-foot Guitar Tower being built at Seminole Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Hollywood.

Hard Rock provides lifeboats for Atlantic City Beach Patrol

BY DAMON SCOTT
Staff Reporter

Editor's note: Staff reporter Beverly Bidney will provide full coverage of the grand opening of the Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Atlantic City in the July 31 issue of the Tribune and on the Tribune's social media.

Most of the media attention and fanfare has been on the June 28 grand opening of the new Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Atlantic City with all its amenities and glitz. Understandably so.

Hard Rock renovated the former Trump Taj Mahal to the tune of $500 million. Carrie Underwood and Pitbull were scheduled to appear. The property features 20 restaurants, a 120,000-square-foot gaming floor, 2,100 slot machines, 120 table games. You get the idea.

But leading up to the opening, Hard Rock officials also forged a partnership that will make guests safer on the beach and in the waters outside the property.

To coincide with Memorial Day weekend, Hard Rock and city officials joined with the Atlantic City Beach Patrol on May 28 to launch a custom-made lifeboat. The boat is one of two that were donated by the Hard Rock to be used off the beaches at Maryland and Virginia avenues for the summer season. Their purpose is to "guard the beach," along several city blocks, much of it in front of the new Hard Rock.

"Atlantic City has a unique demographic of visitors," said Atlantic City Beach Patrol Chief Steve Downey. "There tends to be a lot of non-swimmers, and the beaches are dense [with people]."

He said the boats are used to rescue swimmers who are caught in the rip tide, among other potentially dire situations. The boats carry a two-person team, including a rescue swimmer. The boat is decked out in collage-inspired "Born to Defy" Hard Rock colors, also featuring Atlantic City Beach Patrol lettering along the side.

Downey, who has been chief for four years and in Atlantic City for 30 years, said the donation by Hard Rock marks the first new boats his department has had in 11 years, due to tight city budgets.

"[The new boats] have been met with much joy," Downey said. "Just the Hard Rock coming here – this end of town has been quiet for awhile ... it's going to breathe a breath of fresh air into this part of town."

Those at the event made note that the donation was a gesture that showed the Hard Rock is interested in being a part of the Atlantic City community at large.

Hard Rock Hotel & Casino Atlantic City President Matt Harkness said it was a way to promote the "altruistic and philanthropic" work Hard Rock is doing.

At the Memorial Day christening, Atlantic City Mayor Frank Gilliam and Miss New Jersey, Kaitlyn Schoeffel, took a short ride into the ocean with Beach Patrol to lay a ceremonial wreath marking the occasion and partnership.

Design selected for Smithsonian's National Native American Veterans Memorial

PRESS RELEASE

The jury for the Smithsonian's National Museum of the American Indian National Native American Veterans Memorial has unanimously selected the design concept submitted by Harvey Pratt (Cheyenne/Arapaho) titled "Warriors' Circle of Honor." Groundbreaking for the memorial is slated for Sept. 21, 2019. It is slated to open late 2020.

"Through meeting thousands of Native American veterans, I learned most of all about the commitment these veterans have to the well-being of the United States," said Kevin Gover (Pawnee), director of the museum. "These veterans are perfectly aware that they are serving a country that had not kept its commitments to Native people, and yet they chose – and are still choosing – to serve. This reflects a very deep kind of patriotism. I can think of no finer example of service to the United States and the promise it holds."

Native Americans serve at a higher rate per capita than any other population group. Few outside the military and American Indian Nations know that Native people have served in the U.S. armed forces since the American Revolution and continue to serve today. The nation's capital is known for its grand monuments and solemn memorials, including many honoring the nation's veterans. Yet no national landmark in Washington, D.C., focuses on the contributions of American Indians, Alaska Natives and Native Hawaiians who have served in the military since colonial times.

Pratt is a multimedia artist and recently retired forensic artist, as well as a Marine Corps Vietnam veteran. His design concept is a multisensory memorial. An elevated stainless steel circle rests on an intricately carved stone drum. Listen to Pratt describe his design concept in detail. The selected design will undergo further development in partnership with the museum.

Congress commissioned the museum to build a National Native American Veterans Memorial that gives "all Americans the opportunity to learn of the proud and courageous tradition of service of Native Americans in the Armed Forces of the United States."

The museum worked with the National Congress of American Indians and other Native organizations to create an advisory committee composed of tribal leaders, Native veterans and their family members from across the country who assisted with outreach to Native American communities and veterans. The advisory committee and the museum conducted 35 community consultations across the nation to seek input and support for the memorial. These events resulted in a shared vision and set of design principles for the National Native American Veterans Memorial.

The National Museum of the American Indian conducted an international competition to select design concepts for the National Native American Veterans Memorial. Don Stastny, an architect and urban designer, oversaw the competition. The design was selected through a juried, two-stage process.

For more information about the memorial, go to the National Museum of the American Indian's website.

FGCU volleyball clinic a big hit for Seminole girls

BY BEVERLY BIDNEY
Staff Reporter

FORT MYERS — About 50 girls from Seminole reservations took over the Alico Arena at Florida Gulf Coast University on June 9 for a high level volleyball clinic led by FGCU's coach.

The girls made the "Nest" — the arena's nickname — their own for the day as they polished and practiced skills to make their games stronger. FGCU head coach Matt Botsford led them through a litany of drills including passing, setting, serving and hitting.

"They have a good foundation. I want to refine the concepts and ideas that will help them in the sport. I'm impressed that they've been taught all the right things; they're doing a really good job," said Botsford, whose FGCU team reached the ASUN Conference championship game last season.

It was the second year of the onsite FGCU volleyball program, but this year the Brighton Reservation invited the Chobee Volleyball Academy to participate with them. A few Tribal girls play for the organization, which has seven teams. The 14 and under team, which includes Karey Gopher and Elle Thomas, recently won the AAU South Florida Super Regional Tournament and qualified for the AAU National Volleyball Tournament.

"Last year the clinic really helped them," said Kelly Smiley, Brighton recreation office coordinator. "It refreshed their skills and sharpened them up."

Stanley "Butch" Perchan, FGCU senior associate athletic director for external affairs, welcomed the group. The Tribe's relationship with the university goes back six years and has included volleyball, basketball, softball and golf.

"We just love having the kids from the Tribe here," Perchan said. "But there is a bigger part of this. Sports are meant to help kids finish high school and look at college or trade school. If not FGCU, then make it some other school."

The university also offers summer STEM (science, technology, engineering and math) and dual enrollment programs for Native American students. Perchan said the plan is to make it a five-week residential program next summer.

On the court, the volleyball action was intense as the girls went through the drills.

"Make your hands cradle the ball, shape them like a ball," Botsford told the girls as he taught them how to set properly. "Get your forehead behind the ball."

Ball-handling "rapids," where three girls quickly set and then passed the ball to each other, were next.

"Everybody wants to hit, but hitting is irrelevant if you can't pass and set," Botsford said. "That's why we do this first and then get into hitting. The highest value to a team is these two skills."

Footwork and spiking the ball go hand in hand, so to speak. The coach explained that a three-step approach to the net and being able to rotate to gain momentum increases a player's attack velocity.

"Use your arms to jump and create momentum and you will always jump higher," Botsford said. "Undersized attackers can be really effective by perfecting these techniques."

During the serving drill, the players took turns hitting it over the net. Coach Botsford told them to avoid putting spin on the ball as they served.

"Zero spin makes the ball more difficult to pass," he said. "Spin makes the ball more predictable."

He told the group that most young players toss the ball too high or too far or to the opposite shoulder. The goal is to have as little motion as possible.

"Less motion equals better contact," Botsford said. "Toss, draw, contact, freeze. You should look like a statue when you're done. Stay balanced, frozen and square to the target."

The players worked hard on their moves and appreciated the tips.

"It's awesome," Canaan Jumper said. "I learned the importance of the mechanics of everything."

The footwork drill brought out the giggles for some of these girls, who attended the volleyball clinic to improve their skills.

FORT PIERCE — It didn't take long for excitement to be part of the new Fort Pierce Reservation Summer Slam Shootout basketball tournament.

The one-day adult tournament, which organizers plan to be an annual event, drew three men's teams to Chupco's Landing Community Center on June 23. It started with an opening game thriller.

Trailing by eight points with a minute left in regulation, We'll Be There somehow rallied to tie Biggie and force overtime. The "shot heard around Chupco" came from Al Fludd, who banked in a 3-pointer from the top of the arc with seven-tenths of a second left.

But Biggie responded like the champions they would become later in the day as they shrugged off the late rally and regrouped for an 87-80 overtime win.

Biggie was led by Eugene Joseph, who poured in a game-high 35 points. Joseph, a 6-foot-6 guard from Miami, averaged nearly 14 points last season for ASA College Miami. Biggie also received a big game from Choctaw's T.J. Ben (15 points) and Miccosukee point guard Charlie Osceola (12 points). Ben, a 6-foot-4 guard from Philadelphia, Mississippi, plays for Southwest Mississippi Community College.

Throughout the game, Biggie appeared to be ready to pull away but We'll Be There, captained by Adrian Baker, fought back several times to keep it close. Biggie led 34-30 at halftime and quickly opened a seven-point cushion in the second half but Fludd hit a pair of 3s and another trey from Alejandro Diez made it a one-point game.

A terrific pass from Osceola set up a layup by Ben that gave Biggie a 64-57 lead with less than five minutes left, but Baker drained his fourth 3-pointer before he was ejected on a double-technical with two minutes left.

We'll Be There featured balanced scoring. Fludd led the way with 21 points followed by 20 from Baker, 13 from Diez and 11 from Marquise Fudge.

Biggie went on to beat Fort Pierce and then topped We'll Be There again — this time overtime wasn't needed — in the championship game to claim the tournament's first title and some sleek championship jerseys. We'll Be There finished runner-up and Fort Pierce, which was captained by Antillus Stockton, took third place on its home court.

The Summer Slam was the second adult tournament held at Chupco's Landing since the 18,000-square foot gymnasium/community center/pool opened in 2014. At the start of the day, five teams were scheduled to participate, but two teams didn't show up. The smaller field didn't dampen the optimism.

"It was a great tournament. Even though a couple teams dropped out, the guys still enjoyed themselves and the kids enjoyed watching it," said tournament organizer Remus Griffin of the Fort Pierce Recreation Department.

Griffin said a Thanksgiving tournament is being planned. Whether it's a tournament, or a rez to rez all-day basketball event or just open gym after school, Chupco's Community Center is playing a key role in the community.

"This facility is a great asset to our community," Griffin said. "It gives the kids something to do every day. They utilize it."

Tribe ready to host NAYO

BY KEVIN JOHNSON
Senior Editor

HOLLYWOOD — The NAYO rotation has landed in Hollywood.

The Seminole Tribe will host the annual Native American Youth Organization baseball and softball tournament July 19 to 21. Games will be played on the two fields at the Hollywood Reservation's Osceola Park and five miles away at Brian Piccolo Sports Park in Cooper City. It will be the first time the Tribe has hosted the tournament since 2013 when it drew about 45 teams in Okeechobee.

Teams from the Cherokee (North Carolina), Choctaw (Mississippi), Poarch Creek (Alabama) and Seneca (New York) will come to South Florida in the heart of summer. Hollywood Recreation site manager Joe Collins, who is serving as tournament director, said he expects about 10 Seminole teams will participate. Even though the tournament is being hosted by the Seminoles, it doesn't necessarily cause a spike in the number of Seminole teams. Sometimes families prefer out-of-state trips to combine NAYO tournaments with summer vacations.

"Sometimes going away generates more teams, more talk about it. You'd think the opposite, that playing at home would be easier to get players, but the opportunity to play outside [of Florida] seems to draw more in," Collins said.

As is usually the case with baseball and softball, most Seminole teams will come from the Brighton Reservation. Collins said there will probably be one or two teams from Big Cypress and one team from Hollywood. Immokalee, which has some strong softball players, could have representation, too. Several Seminole Recreation employees will be working at the tournament and some will be coaches.

"We're doing everything from trash pickup, putting up tents, selling shirts, water, ice. The staff is heavily involved," Collins said.

This is the first time the Tribe has used Brian Piccolo Sports Park for a NAYO tournament. NAYO will occupy all eight fields at the park, which is named in memory of the former Chicago Bears running back from Fort Lauderdale who died from cancer in 1970 at age 26 and whose inspirational story played out in the movie "Brian's Song."

The tournament features 10 divisions, five each for baseball and softball. Age groups start at 7-8 for coach-pitch all the way up to high school for 16-17 with a few 18s who meet the age deadline requirements.

Uncooperative weather always seems to play a role at NAYO no matter the location. With outdoor games in the Florida heat in July, Collins stressed the importance of staying hydrated. He said the past couple tournaments have had heat exhaustion incidents.

"It will be tough on the players playing in this. We've already warned them. They need to be hydrating weeks ahead of time; if you just drink here, you're in trouble," he said. "Mississippi and Alabama have pretty much the same weather we have, so they're used to it, but like the Cherokee and the teams from New York, they need to start hydrating weeks out, drinking tons of water."

Collins said the heat warnings apply to spectators, too.

"Even though you're sitting in a chair, you have to drink, too, because you will sweat here," he said.

The tournament will be staffed by Seminole Fire Rescue personnel at both locations.

Games will have time limits. It's 75 minutes for all softball and the 7-8 baseball, 90 minutes for 9-10 and 11-12 baseball, and two hours for 13-15 and 16-17 baseball. The two older baseball divisions play seven innings; the rest of the divisions play six innings.

Teams that finish in first, second or third place receive trophies. Champions will get jackets.

Collins said he would like vendors to be a part of the tournament environment in Hollywood.

"I want to bring the vendors from the community, especially the seniors, and allow them to be on site to sell their products. To me, it brings in the community to the event," he said.

As for visitors, Collins said he's fielded a lot of calls about things to do outside of the games.

"I get a lot of them asking about the distance to the beaches, the distance to Orlando," he said.

Last year's NAYO tournament was held at the same time as the North American Indigenous Games in Toronto, so participation on the Seminole side was lighter than usual because some of the athletes were in Canada.

The Tribe wouldn't mind duplicating the success it had in the 2013 tournament in Okeechobee when three of its teams (9-10 baseball, 13-15 baseball and 16-18 softball) won championships.

When the tournament ends, the focus for Hollywood will shift to the NAYO basketball tournament, which it will host Easter weekend.

N7 unveils summer collection

PRESS RELEASE

"When we introduce ourselves, it is the name given to us as a child. My name is Gaagwagehe: The sun is leaning, the orb is going down, like the sunset."

This line from Jeremy Thompson, member of the Iroquois Confederacy of the Onondaga Nation and professional lacrosse player, illustrates this summer's Nike N7 collection: footwear and apparel inspired by the vertical expanse of sky and water, each element a refracted sibling of the other, bending into many blues as the sun drops into the horizon line.

The collection's indigo print, inspired by the image of sky reflecting onto water, was made through a method of natural dyeing in which flowers were collected, mixed through a giant vat and produced onto a large piece of fabric. The image was then scanned in order for the color to be sublimated onto technical sportswear fabric. The print appears prominently in the women's collection, covering the muscle tank, compression tights and Air Max 1. It's also on the unisex cap as well as the heels of both the men's N7 Air Max Motion LW and the N7 Kyrie 4, which also shows a Standing Rock tribal seal decal.

The Standing Rock Sioux Tribe's seal has special significance for Irving: The point guard's late mother, Elizabeth Ann Larson, was an enrolled member of the Standing Rock Sioux nation. Irving approached Nike and asked for the tribal seal to be incorporated into the shoe.

"I'm humbled that we were able to place Standing Rock's tribal seal on this N7 shoe," says Irving. "I'm proud of my personal history, so to have this opportunity to represent my family as well as the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe is an incredible honor. Mom, this is for you. I love you so much."

The other major graphic symbol in the collection is the chevron, a recurring pattern in Native American iconography that is visible in the fletch of an arrow, beadwork and armor chest plates. Traces of the chevron are also deeply embedded in lacrosse; the collection's hoodie uses the symbol to mimic elbow pads, offering critical protection for Thompson in the heat of play. Seven bars, standing for the number's significance in the N7 collection (its mission statement reads, "In every deliberation, we must consider the impact of our decisions on the seventh generation"), compose the classic pattern.

Strength is reinforced throughout the collection by the chevron graphic's visibility: The symbols are bold, particularly in the T-shirts, which display the chevron on the chest. The graphic also appears in inconspicuous areas of other apparel, including the elbows of the hoodie, on the embroidered front of the hat and down the calf of the women's tights.

Hard Rock Stadium to host week of elite soccer matches

STAFF REPORT

MIAMI GARDENS — Late July will feature plenty of elite soccer matches — men's and women's — at Hard Rock Stadium in Miami Gardens.

Dubbed "Miami Week" from July 26 to 29, top tier men's matches will include Bayern Munich vs Manchester City on July 28 and Manchester United vs Real Madrid on July 31. Fans will also have a chance to watch these powerhouses in open training sessions on July 27 and July 30.

The first-ever Women's International Champions Cup, featuring some of the world's top female soccer players, will also be part of "Miami Week." Manchester City, Olympique Lyonnais, Paris Saint-Germain and North Carolina Courage will vie for the inaugural Cup.

"The success of the International Champions Cup over these past six years has shown the popularity and enthusiasm for soccer in this country," said Charlie Stillitano, co-founder and executive chairman of Relevant, the event's organizer. "It is a natural direction to expand to include the women's game."

Miami Week will also include a variety of events under the name "House of Soccer" on July 27. Music, art, local tournaments and a 5-on-5 Legends match between FC Bayern and the Miami Dolphins are on the agenda.

For tickets visit internationalchampionscup.com.

Hollywood sports camp keeps kids active this summer

BY KEVIN JOHNSON
Senior Editor

HOLLYWOOD — Watching sports, such as this year's World Cup soccer tournament, is one thing; being an active participant is another.

So while much of the world's eyes have been glued to Russia, the Hollywood Recreation Department is making sure youngsters do more than sit in front of a TV.

With movement being the core of its mission, the department's sports camp started June 11 and will run until Aug. 3.

"Our goal for this year is that it has to revolve around some type of motion, whether it's actual physical sports or activities," said Hollywood Recreation site manager Joe Collins. "We've eliminated movies and stuff like that where they're sitting."

The camp is filled with youngsters ages five to 12. Collins stressed that kids don't have to be athletic to be active.

The menu is loaded with sports such as archery, basketball, soccer, swimming, kickball, volleyball and much more.

"We're going to expose them to as many sports as we can, with a heavy emphasis on basketball," Collins said. "In the afternoon, every Monday through Wednesday from 1:30 to 3 they do a basketball clinic with Jay Garland, our fitness trainer. He puts them through drills."

After seeing some less than desirable results at the most recent NAYO basketball tournament, Collins said it's time to re-energize the sport with youth on the reservation.

"Hollywood has always been king of basketball," Collins said. "We're really putting an emphasis on basketball. When we come out of summer, we're going to bring back our Itty Bitty program where we're aiming it at the five-and-six-year-old group. I want these kids walking around this facility or the reservation bouncing basketballs."

Two field trips per week are filled with motion, too, from ice skating at Pines Ice Arena to indoor skydiving at iFly. Even a day at the beach isn't necessarily a day at the beach.

"It's in the sand, so they're going to be playing volleyball and soccer. Everything we do is to try to keep them active the entire day," Collins said.

The camp does make time for educational breathers, such as trips to the Ah-Tah-Thi-Ki Museum and the Phillip and Patricia Frost Museum of Science.

The camp is also providing a summer of learning for five teens from the SWEP program. The kids are assisting in all facets of recreation and even attending staff meetings. "They'll get a taste of everything we do in Recreation," Collins said.

A day at the ballpark for Hollywood seniors

BY KEVIN JOHNSON
Senior Editor

MIAMI — Hollywood seniors received a taste of the Big Leagues on June 14.

The Hollywood Senior Center organized a trip to Marlins Park to see the Miami Marlins host the San Francisco Giants in a rare weekday matinee. Most of the 9,726 fans in attendance were kids from various organizations who arrived in large groups.

The Senior Center group, which consisted of about a dozen people, arrived on a bus driven by Joe Kippenberger. They sat in the final few rows of Section 23 on the left field side. They all had barely settled into their seats with their hot dogs and popcorn before Andrew McCutcheon and Mac Williamson smacked home runs to give the Giants a 3-0 lead after an inning-and-a-half.

Thunder and rain started about 1 p.m., but thanks to the park's roof, there was no delay.

The Marlins clawed their way back into the game with runs in the fifth and seventh innings.

With the Marlins trailing 3-2 in the ninth inning, the group decided to head back to Hollywood. The Marlins made sure there was more baseball to be played. They pushed across the tying run on a one-out sacrifice fly by Lewis Brinson. The game remained knotted at 3-3 all the way until the 16th when the Giants scored three times and emerged with a 6-3 win that lasted four hours, 49 minutes.

It was the longest game of the season for the Giants, and the second longest for the Marlins.

On deck for the Hollywood seniors is a trip to Hawaii in July.

Sean Osceola signs with Pasco-Hernando State College

BY KEVIN JOHNSON

BRIGHTON — Sean Osceola hopes to carry the momentum from his outstanding high school baseball season right into college.

The 2018 Okeechobee High School graduate was sensational on the mound as the right-hander from the Brighton Reservation helped lead the Brahms to stunning victories against Jensen Beach, Dwyer and Martin County in the team's longest postseason run in 13 years.

During the playoffs, Osceola, son of Reno and Kelli Osceola, signed with Pasco-Hernando State College in New Port Richey — about 40 miles north of Tampa — where he'll play starting this fall.

"They have a really good baseball program," Osceola said. "They have a lot of history of success. I'm hoping to go there for a year or two and then transfer to a four-year school."

Pasco-Hernando has been coached by Stephen Winterling for nearly 30 years. More than 30 players from the program have signed professional contracts.

In 2014, Pasco-Hernando made its first-ever trip to the National Junior College Athletic Association's Division II College World Series and finished fourth. In 2018, the team went 36-18, marking the second most victories in the program's history.

As for academics, Osceola said he plans to study psychology. He said he's interested in working for the Tribe, perhaps as a counselor.

"I really like helping people," he said. By staying ahead of batters, not going deep in counts and avoiding walks, Osceola certainly helped the Brahms generate a memorable postseason run. As a .500 club during the regular season and seeded fourth in a four-team district playoff, an early exit wouldn't have been surprising, but Okeechobee shocked No. 1 Jensen Beach in the semifinals as Osceola dueling Cincinnati Reds second round draft choice Lyon Richardson pitch-for-pitch in six scoreless innings. The Brahms won 2-0 with a pair of runs in the eighth inning. In his six innings on the mound, Osceola fanned five, walked none and scattered five hits.

Osceola was just as sharp in a 2-0 regional quarterfinal win against Dwyer (five scoreless innings and he hit a home run) and a 2-1 regional semifinal win against Martin County (six innings of two-hit ball, four strikeouts, one earned run). He had another solid outing in the regional final, but the Brahms were ousted 2-0 by Doral Academy.

During the playoff push, Osceola said he cherished all the good memories.

"What's been happening in the past couple weeks, hard-fought games and all the chemistry we have and all the good times," he said at the time. "I'm soaking it all in because it's one last time."

In addition to his career with Okeechobee, Osceola also played travel ball for Team Phenom and SWFL Nation.

Fish & Wildlife Foundation of Florida names pro golfer Jerry Pate to board

PRESS RELEASE

Professional golfer Jerry Pate, who won the 1976 U.S. Open, has been appointed to a three-year term on the board of directors of the nonprofit Fish & Wildlife Foundation of Florida.

Pate, of Pensacola, was elected at a recent meeting of the foundation's board of directors.

"Jerry is an avid outdoorsman and has spent many years in volunteer service to the Northwest Florida Water Management District and the Gulf Coast Council of the Boy Scouts of America, among many other organizations. He brings considerable knowledge of water issues and the importance of outdoor education for youth to this role," Board Chairman Dick Corbett said in a press release.

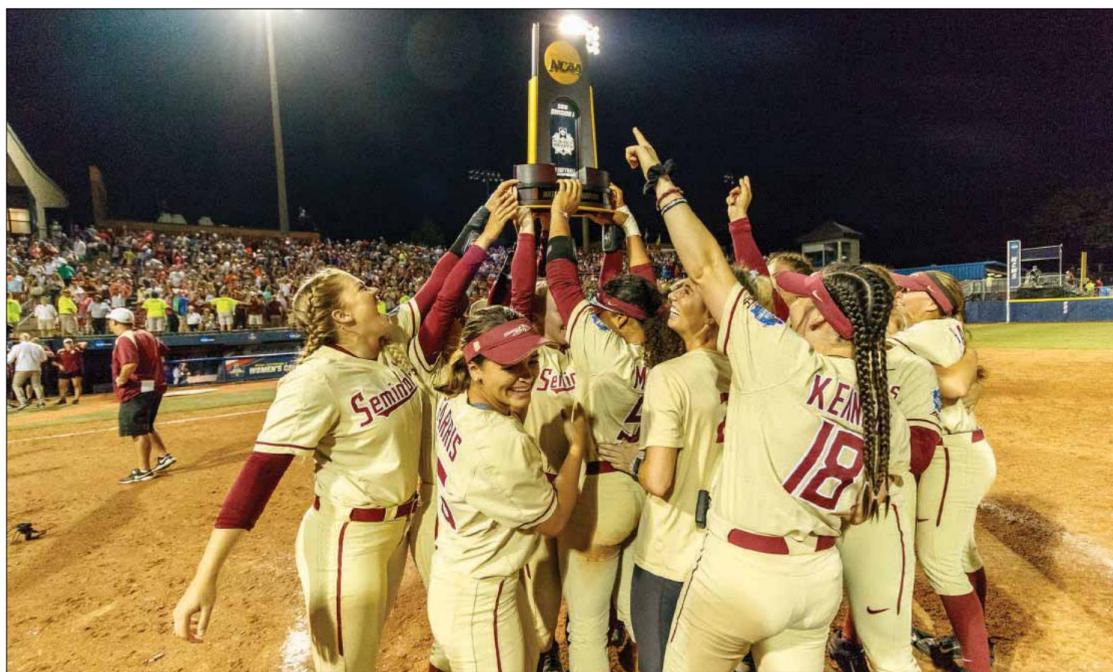

"As a youth growing up in Alabama and northwest Florida, I gained a sincere interest in the outdoors and the environment through the game of golf, Boy Scouts, hunting and fishing," Pate said. "I am passionate about preserving our state's precious resources so future generations may experience the outdoors as I have been so fortunate to enjoy it."

Pate garnered eight PGA Tour victories. In addition to the 1976 U.S. Open, he won the Tournament Players Championship in 1982. Since 1977, his company, Jerry Pate Design, has developed award-winning golf courses, including Kiva Dunes, Old Waverly Golf Club and The Preserve Golf Club in Mississippi, and Trump National Colts Neck in New Jersey. In 2010, Jerry Pate Design also began providing certified landscape architecture services in Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and Georgia, and has created many transformative and award-winning community parks, urban streetscapes, corporate and educational campuses, and athletic facilities, including Pensacola's Vince Whibbs, Sr. Community Maritime Park and Admiral Mason Park.

Pate is one of the longest-serving current members and current vice chair of the board of the Northwest Florida Water Management District. He is also a board member of the Gulf Coast Council of the Boy Scouts of America and the Andrews Institute Research & Education Foundation, which is dedicated to advancing the science of orthopedic care.

The Fish & Wildlife Foundation of Florida is dedicated to supporting the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission and other public and private partners to conserve Florida's fish and wildlife resources and the lands and waters they need to survive.

FSU softball wins national title Seminoles played on Hollywood Reservation in '16

BY KEVIN JOHNSON

Nineteen months after the Florida State University softball team came to a Seminole Tribe of Florida reservation for the first time and learned about the Tribe's unconquered history and spirit, the 'Noles completed their 'unconquered' season by winning the NCAA Division I national championship with an 8-3 triumph June 5 against the University of Washington at the Women's College World Series in Oklahoma City.

Back on Oct. 23, 2016, FSU played Florida International University in a fall scrimmage on the Hollywood Reservation. Jessie Warren (3-for-4, 1 HR, 2 RBIs in Tuesday's championship clinching win) and Anna Shelnut (solo HR in Monday's 1-0 win) were among the Seminole players who played that day at Osceola Park in Hollywood. The ceremonial first pitch was thrown by Hollywood Councilman Chris Osceola. FSU coach Lonni Alameda and the players also met Jr. Miss Florida Seminole Thomlynn Billie and current Hollywood Board Rep. Gordon "Ollie" Wareham.

"It was a great experience to be out here on actual Seminole land," Shelnut said after the game on the reservation. "It ... made us think who we're playing for and what we're representing."

"We got a little education on kind of the unconquered spirit, but also the unconquered Tribe and what that means," Alameda said at the time.

NABI to be featured in AT&T docuseries 'Religion of Sports'

PRESS RELEASE

The AT&T Audience Network is bringing another season of "Religion of Sports" to the altar. The network has picked up the original docuseries for a third season.

The series highlights stories from across the globe through tales of rivalries, cultural differences and competition and is executive produced by New England Patriot Tom Brady, Pro Football Hall of Famer Michael Strahan and award-winning filmmaker Gotham Chopra.

The third season will feature sports stories from around the world including the Isle of Man TT which follows the most dangerous motorcycle race in the world. Riders must navigate the old, windy roads of a small English village at speeds close to 200 mph.

Religion will also take an in-depth look at Iceland's national soccer team, which is the smallest nation to qualify for the World Cup. The lens will also focus on the biggest event in the Rezball calendar: the Native American Basketball Invitational. The massive knockout-style tournament features indigenous teams from around the country.

And finally, the series will take the plunge into the lives of two of the best free divers in the world as they go head to head in the Vertical Blue competing to be crowned the best diver.

Religion of Sports is produced by Dirty Robber Productions. Chris Uettwiller, Martin Desmond Roe and Constance Schwartz-Morini also serve as executive producers.

The AT&T Audience Network will premiere the third season of "Religion of Sports" at 8 p.m. on Nov. 21.

World War II Navajo code talker Samuel Tom Holiday passes at 94

PRESS RELEASE

WINDOW ROCK, Ariz. — Navajo Nation President Russell Begaye and Vice President Jonathan Nez offered their condolences to the family of Navajo Code Talker Samuel Tom Holiday, who passed away June 11 at age 94.

Born in Monument Valley, Utah, on June 2, 1924, Holiday served with the 4th Marine Division, 25th Regiment during World War II. Part of an elite group of Marines, Holiday sent and received coded messages as he served his country in Saipan, Iwo Jima, Tinian and Marshall Island, in the Pacific Theater. That code, based on the Navajo language, proved unbreakable and helped the United States win the war. Holiday received a Congressional Silver Medal and a Purple Heart for his service.

“Our Code Talkers are Navajo heroes and they are national heroes,” President Begaye said. “As we remember the life of Samuel Holiday, we also honor his selfless service to both the Navajo Nation and to the United States.”

After the war, Holiday made his home in Kayenta, Arizona, and worked as a police officer. He married Lupita Mae Isaac in 1954 and the two had eight children, 33 grandchildren, 28 great-grandchildren and two great-great grandchildren.

Holiday’s health began to fail shortly after his 94th birthday. He died at the Southern Utah Veterans Home in Ivins, surrounded by family members – many of whom were able to travel because of donations from a GoFundMe page.

“Our sincerest condolences go out to the family of Navajo Code Talker Samuel T. Holiday,” Vice President Nez said. “He was a dedicated advocate for the youth and for health and wellness.”

The vice president said Holiday’s family would take him to the Navajo Nation Park Race Series every year, where he congratulated every finisher.

“The Navajo Nation took pride knowing we had Mr. Holiday representing our communities and we will always remember his words of encouragement and inspiration,” Vice President Nez said. “The Nation thanks Code Talker Samuel T. Holiday and his family for their service. We will keep each of you in our prayers.”

Tribune wins 9 NAJA awards

STAFF REPORT

The Seminole Tribune earned nine national Native media awards from the Native American Journalists Association for coverage during 2017. NAJA announced the award winners June 12. NAJA’s annual competition recognizes excellence in reporting by Native and non-Native journalists across the U.S. and Canada. NAJA received more than 500 entries in seven divisions.

Tribune staff reporter Beverly Bidney won four awards, including first place for Best News Story in Associate Division I for her coverage of Hurricane Irma and first place for Best Photo of Native America, which was featured in a story about 4-H in Big Cypress.

Copy editor/reporter Li Cohen received three awards, including two for her coverage of the Lake Okeechobee Watershed Project. Senior editor Kevin Johnson won two awards, including second place in Best Sports Story in the combined Associate Division I and II category for his coverage of rodeo’s return to the Hollywood Reservation.

NAJA will present the awards during its national Native media awards banquet at a journalists convention July 18-21 in Miami.

Look At Me Now

Look at me now I’m no longer that warrior with a criminal mind,
As life goes on I continue to write about reality through these eyes of mine.

So much has changed since those years of raising hell,
Many have gone to the grave, some have changed for the better and the rest sit in a cell.

There’s no honor in dying in the streets or glorifying the past,
This warrior wants to be remembered with a positive impression that lasts.

We can talk about my life of crime I’m not ashamed,
Pulling the trigger from time to time is part of the game.

I had my fun and did what I wanted to do,
I gave Aawaache my word that criminal life is through.

I will keep my word until I breathe my last,
If you need a lesson in loyalty I’ll give you that class.

Second to none it always has and always will be,

Though I’ve changed for the better I still don’t care if you love or hate me.

Look at me now against all odds I’ve risen above it all,
This unconquered warrior is standing strong and standing tall.

Warrior 4 Life,
Ike T. Harjo
Koowaathi

Don’t Look At Me As A Stranger

Don’t look at me as a stranger I’m one of your own,
Where have I been throughout the years as you have grown?

I’ve been sitting in a cage for twenty-one years,
For living a life of crime since tattooed tears.

When I left the Rez that was my first mistake,
I’ve seen different cultures with different people that are fake.

They turn their back on their own kind and kick them while down,
Always judging as if they sit on a throne with a crown.

Once I seen all this I was “more” thankful and grateful to be Seminole,
No unity and cutting each other’s throats literally isn’t how we roll.

Being Seminole is unconquered and full of pride,
Staying true to your own kind not switching sides.

Don’t allow yourself to get caught up in the those cultures that are fake,
Take heed to my advice or we’ll be referring to you as late.

Don’t look at me as a stranger get to know this Native son,
My name is Ike T. Harjo, Panther, Jennie Billie Harjo’s unconquered one.

Warrior 4 Life,

NAIHC names Cherokee Nation’s Gary Cooper as chairman

PRESS RELEASE

WASHINGTON, D.C. — At its 43rd annual convention in June during the annual meeting of its voting members, the National American Indian Housing Council (NAIHC) elected Gary Cooper as its chairman. Prior to being elected, Cooper served on the NAIHC board of directors as vice chairman, and was Legislative Committee chair.

“I truly appreciate our members’ support in selecting me as the new Chairman, and look forward to working with all of you over the next two years to ensure NAIHC is meeting the needs of our tribal housing programs,” Cooper said.

Cooper succeeds Sami Jo Difuntorum, Housing executive director of the Confederated Tribes of the Siletz Indians of Oregon.

Cooper is executive director of the Housing Authority of the Cherokee Nation. He has worked for Cherokee Nation in Indian housing since 1999. Prior to being named Executive Director at the housing authority, he served as Executive Director of Cherokee Nation Housing Services.

He has been instrumental in the revitalization of the Housing Authority as a means of constructing new homes for Cherokee families. Cooper is an enrolled member and citizen of the Cherokee Nation.

As a small child living in rural Northeast Oklahoma, Cooper himself experienced the positive impact of housing. Indian housing, through the HACN and Cherokee Nation, has played a major role throughout all of Cooper’s life.

“I don’t know where I would be today if it wasn’t for the hand-up, not hand-outs, that Cherokee Nation has assisted not just my family but others with over the years” Cooper said.

PRESS RELEASE

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — At the conclusion of the 2018 USET semi-annual meeting, the United South and Eastern Tribes, Inc. (USET) and USET Sovereignty Protection Fund (SPF) team met with Maori indigenous relatives from Aotearoa (New Zealand).

The conversation focused on common histories of oppression, current challenges as indigenous peoples/governments, and similar efforts for treaties to be honored and respected as a necessary component of Tribal nation rebuilding efforts.

Additionally, USET/USPF staff shared the history and role of the organization in supporting, protecting, and promoting the inherent sovereign authorities of its member Tribal nations. The groups committed to staying in contact to further and support each other’s respective efforts.

“The meeting was poignant and moving...a wonderful friendship and bond was created,” said USET Executive Director Kitcki Carroll.

The USET Semi-Annual Meeting was held June 18-20 at the Nashville Airport Marriott.

USET is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization dedicated to enhancing the development of federally recognized Indian tribes, to improving the capabilities of Tribal governments, and assisting USET members and their governments in dealing effectively with public policy issues.

The Maori are descendants of the indigenous Polynesian people who settled New Zealand between 1250 and 1300. During centuries of isolation, they developed unique life ways, their own language, a rich mythology, and distinctive performing arts. In 1840, New Zealand had a Maori population of 60,000, and around 2,000 Europeans. By 1870, after the influx of more Europeans and the diseases they brought, the Maori population had been reduced to 37,000.

Today, New Zealand has a population of 4.4 million that includes a Maori population of 600,000. Maori are active in all spheres of New Zealand culture and society, with independent representation in areas such as media, politics and sport. Famous Maori include opera singer Inia Te Wiata, and canoeist Lisa Carrington, who won gold at the 2012 and 2016 Summer Olympics.
